This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

+ Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.

+ Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.

+ Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.

+ Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at `http://books.google.com/`

CASES

DECIDED IN

THE HOUSE OF LORDS,

W. & T. ADAMS AND OTHERS, Appellants (Pursuers).—Sol.-Gen. Sir C. Pearson, Q.C.—Law.
THE GREAT NORTH OF SCOTLAND RAILWAY COMPANY, Respondents (Defenders).—D.-F. Balfour, Q.C.—Ferguson.

Nov. 27, 1890.
Adams v. Great North of Scotland Railway Co.

Arbitration—Act of Regulation, 1695, sec. 25 (issued under Act, 1693, c. 34)—Reduction of decreet-arbitral—Corruption—Constructive corruption.—Sec. 25 of the Act of Regulation, which excludes reduction of decreets-arbitral "upon any cause or reason whatsoever, unless that of corruption, bribery, or falsehood, to be alleged against the judges-arbitrators who pronounced the same," does not apply where it is alleged that the arbiter has exceeded the fines compromissi, or in the course of the arbitration has disregarded any one of the express conditions contained in the contract of submission, or of those conditions which the law implies in every submission.

Opinions (per Lord Watson and Lord Bramwell) that the word "corruption" is used in its natural sense, and that to bring a case within the exception it is necessary to allege that there was actual corruption on the part of the judge-arbitrator.

Contractors for making a railway were bound by their contract to complete the works by a day specified, but it was provided that if any delay should arise from any cause not imputable to the contractors, this might be stated to the arbiter "as a reason for not completing the works within the time specified," and the arbiter was authorised "to extend the time for completing the same for such time as he shall consider reasonable." The contractors were bound to pay £20 of liquidate damages for each day's delay beyond the time specified, "or such extended period as the arbiter may determine as aforesaid." All disputes under the contract or as to its construction were referred to the arbiter. No application for extension of time was made to the arbiter during the progress of the works, but in a decree-arbitral, after the completion of the works, the arbiter, in fixing the amount of liquidate damages for delay, extended the period for completion of the works for six months.

In a reduction of the decree-arbitral brought by the contractors, on the ground that the arbiter had exceeded his jurisdiction in extending the time after the completion of the works, held (in aff. judgment of First Division) that even if the arbiter was not entitled after the completion of the works to extend the time, he was entitled, in determining the amount of liquidate damages, to take into account delays caused by the railway company; and that, in any view, as the construction of the contract had been left to the arbiter, his judgment could not be reduced.

A contract for making part of a railway provided that all disputes between the parties "under or in reference to the contract, or in regard to the true intent, meaning, and construction of the same, or of the specifications," &c., should be referred to A B as arbiter.

The contractor was bound to complete the line of railway on 30th September

No. 1.

Nov. 27, 1890. Adams v. Great North of Scotland Railway Co.

1884, under a liquidate penalty of £20 for every day's delay, but it was stipulated by the railway company that 400 yards of embankment forming part of the line should not be formed until another contractor had completed the east abutment of a bridge and the diversion of a river, or until he had received the written instructions of the engineer to proceed with the embankment. The line was not completed till 1st May 1886.

The arbiter found that the contractor was liable in penalties for each day's delay (exclusive of Sundays) from 30th March 1885 to 1st May 1886.

In an action of reduction of the decree-arbitral brought by the contractor, it was proved that the contractor had not got access to the ground on which the 400 yards of embankment was to be formed until February 1886. The arbiter stated that he was satisfied that the contractor had not been ready to use the ground until he got it, and that his delay was not due to his not having had access to it until February 1886.

Held (aff. judgment of First Division) that, as the whole matter, including the construction of the contract, had been referred to the arbiter, the Act of Regulation prevented reduction of the arbiter's award.

Ld. Chancellor (Halsbury). Lord Watson. Ld. Bramwell. Ld. Herschell. Lord Morris.

(IN the Court of Session, June 21, 1889, 16 R. 843.)

In January 1883 the Great North of Scotland Railway Company entered into two contracts with Messrs W. & T. Adams, contractors, Callander, for the construction of a railway from Portsoy to Elgin. The first, the Portsoy contract, embraced two sections of the railway (1) from Portsoy to Tochieneal Station, (2) from Tochieneal Station to Portnockie. The second, the Buckie contract, embraced the line from Portnockie to the river Spey.

By the Portsoy contract the contractors were bound to complete the first section by 30th September 1883, and the second section by 30th September 1884, "or on or before such respective days thereafter as may be respectively fixed by the arbiter after named, under the declaration hereinbefore written."

A previous clause contained this provision,—"And the said second party [i.e. the Messrs Adam] bind and oblige themselves and their foresaids to intimate to the said first party in writing when they are ready to commence said works, and any delay which may thereafter occur, if any, in giving the said second party possession of such lands as the engineer shall consider necessary for carrying on said works, shall not confer on the said second party a right to claim damages against the said first party, or to break this contract, but may be stated to the arbiter hereinafter named as a reason for not completing the said works within the time after specified, and if it shall appear to said arbiter that the said second party was prevented from completing the said works by that delay or by any stoppage from any cause not imputable to the said second party, the said arbiter shall be entitled to extend the time for completing the same for such period as he shall consider reasonable, but of the propriety of giving the said extension of time, and the length thereof, the said arbiter shall be sole judge."

The contract further bore,—"And it is hereby further declared that the said second party shall be liable in all damages and extra expenses which may be incurred by, or occasioned to, the said first party by the said second party or their foresaids failing to complete the said works, or to have the same ready for opening by the times respectively hereinbefore stipulated; and as compensation for loss of profits to the company should the foresaid respective portions of the line not be in a state to be opened for public traffic by the times stipulated, it is hereby declared and agreed on that the said second party shall be bound to pay to the said first party the sum of £20 sterling as the liquidate and agreed-on compensation for every day during which each of the foresaid respective portions of the line, or any part thereof, shall remain unfinished, or in a state not to admit of its being opened for public traffic, after the said 30th day of September 1883 and 30th day of September 1884 respectively, or such extended periods as the said arbiter may determine as aforesaid."

By the contract the parties submitted to Mr B. Hall Blyth, as sole arbiter, "all disputes and differences which have arisen or shall or may arise between them under or in reference to the contract, or in regard to the true intent, meaning, and construction of the same, or of the said specifications, conditions," &c.

Great delay took place in the execution of the works, but no application was made to the arbiter for an extension of the time allowed for the completion of the works during their progress.

Disputes having arisen between the parties as to the sums payable by the contractors as penalties or liquidate damages, the matter was brought before the arbiter, who issued the following finding on the Portsoy contract:—"Find that the first portion of said works was not completed by said contractors on said 30th September 1883, but was completed by them on 1st April 1884, and the said remainder or second portion of said works was not completed by the said contractors on 30th September 1884, but was completed by them on 1st May 1886: Find that I am entitled to extend, and I hereby do extend, the time for completing the said second portion from said 30th September 1884 to the 30th March 1885: Find that the balance of price," &c.

A similar finding was given by the arbiter on the Buckie contract, which contained the same clauses—the extension of time allowed by the arbiter in his decree being from 30th September 1884 to 30th March 1885.

Messrs Adams thereafter brought a reduction of the two decrees-arbitral on various grounds (enumerated by Lord Fraser, 16 R. 850).

The First Division, on 21st June 1889, reduced the arbiter's decrees to a certain amount, on the ground that the arbiter had awarded a larger sum of penalties than the railway company claimed, and quoad ultra assoilzied the defenders.

The pursuers appealed.

The only grounds of reduction insisted on in the appeal were the third and sixth of those mentioned by Lord Fraser.

"Third, that the arbiter was not entitled after the time specified for the completion of the works to extend the time for such completion."

The sixth was founded on the following clause in the specifications and conditions for the construction of the Buckie section:—"The portion of the embankment of the line, between pegs Nos. 892 and 899, shall not be formed until the contractor for the bridge or viaduct over the river Spey has completed the works in connection with the erection of the east abutment of the bridge, the diversion of the river, and the erection of the protection walls embraced in the contract for the Spey Bridge, or until he has received the written instructions of the engineer or assistant-engineer to proceed with the formation of the said portion of the embankment. . . ."

The pursuers averred,—(Cond. 11) "The aforesaid bridge across the river Spey at Garmouth, forming part of the Buckie Railway, was built by the firm of Blaikie Brothers, under a contract with the defenders similar to those of the pursuers, and dated in the same month of January 1883. . . . Part of the pursuers' contract with the defenders was to connect the bridge with the Buckie section of the railway by an embankment, but it was impossible to do this, and so complete the Buckie section of the defenders' contracts, till the bridge was finished. Messrs Blaikie Brothers had contracted to finish the bridge by the 31st July 1884, but they did not do so till the month of May 1886. It was not till the month of February 1886 that the pursuers were put in possession by the defenders of the land necessary for the formation of the aforesaid embankment. On 20th January 1886 the defenders' resident engineer addressed a letter to the pursuers, stating that he expected that the river Spey would be diverted in a week, provided the weather kept favourable, and that he trusted they were making all the preparations necessary for filling in the banking required. The material for the embankment had to be brought from Portgordon, a distance of three miles. It was thus impossible for the pursuers to have completed the works under their Buckie contract until two months or thereabouts after the said month of February 1886. . . . The said Benjamin Hall Blyth has, by the decree applicable to the Buckie contract, found the pursuers liable in the sum of £6800 in name of liquidated damages, being at the rate of £20 per day for the period from 30th March 1885 to 1st May 1886, and as if the bridge at Garmouth had been completed by the month of January 1885." In answer the defenders, inter alia, denied that the completion of the works under the Buckie contract was in fact retarded or materially affected by the state of the works of the Spey Bridge, and explained that any question of delay so arising was by the contract submitted to the decision of the arbiter.

It was proved that the contractors did not get possession of the ground till February 1886.

The pursuers pleaded that the decrees were ultra fines compromissi, and that in the circumstances they were corrupt, unconscionable, and unjust.

At delivering judgment,—

LORD CHANCELLOR.—I confess it appears to me that this is a very plain case. I do not at present assent to the view in the direct form in which it has been alleged[1] that the law of Scotland applicable to this case is different from the law of England.

There is no doubt that at one time the Courts in both countries treated themselves rather as being in the position of Courts of Appeal, and examined whether or not the conclusion at which an arbitrator had arrived was sound, both in point of law and in point of fact. I think the only learned Judge who ever gave distinct expression to that view was Lord Thurlow, and I am the more desirous of alluding to him and doing him justice, because I think that what Lord Thurlow says in Knox v. Symmonds[2] rather throws some doubt upon the question whether he ever was responsible for the statement put into his mouth in the case which has been quoted at the bar—Colquhoun v. Corbet.[3] Lord Thurlow says that it is no ground for setting aside an award that the conclusion was wrong, otherwise it would be a ground for setting aside all awards, but his Lordship then goes on to say that, where certain facts are submitted to an arbitrator by the Court, the arbitrator must be considered to be somewhat in the position of a Master, and that the Court when the matter comes back to them have to consider not only whether the Master has acted according to law, but whether he has arrived at a sound conclusion. His Lordship goes on to distinguish arbitrations in the more popular sense of the word, and shews that where there are real arbitrations, and where the parties have selected their judge, in such cases you have to shew a great deal more than mere error on the part of the arbitrator in the conclusion at which he has arrived before the Court can interfere with his award. And in the Court of Common Pleas forty years ago, in a case in which the arbitrator had a question of law submitted to him according to the ordinary forms of pleading, the Court having come to the conclusion that the decision of the arbitrator was, in the sense in which they understood the words, erroneous in deciding upon a question of law, on demurrer nevertheless held that the parties having submitted that question to the arbitrator, it was for the arbitrator to determine it,—in their own language, the parties had agreed to accept the arbitrator's decision upon the question of law, as well as his decision upon the facts—Stimpson v. Emmerson.[1] In the Court of Queen's Bench, thirty years ago, that decision was adopted as being the law which would guide the Court in the decision of such questions.

Upon the facts now before your Lordships everything appears to have been practically abandoned except the third objection, referred to by the Lord Ordinary, and the sixth. Now, with regard to the third objection, the difficulty seems to me to arise upon the perhaps not very well conceived or selected words of the contract. That the parties by that contract intended that the arbitrator should have the power of determining between the parties whether or not liquidated damages (I assume now that what are called the penalties are liquidated damages) should be ascertained by the arbitrator with reference to the conduct of both parties is manifest, and the language which is used undoubtedly prima facie (for my own part, I am prepared to admit as much as that) rather looks like an intention by the parties that that determination by the arbitrator should go on during the currency of the contract, that he should be the consulting engineer, that he should be the person to whom application should be made in the event of alleged default on the one side or the other. But I am by no means prepared to assent to the conclusion that that excludes the consideration of such questions afterwards. Having regard to the documents before us it is almost impossible to suppose that the parties did understand that, when the arbitrator was investigating the question what damages were to be reported, he was not to have regard to the conduct of both parties, and that if one party had withheld the possession of the land, that party was not to insist upon the delay consequential upon his action as being one of the elements of the case in respect of which he could claim damages. It is impossible, I think, to read the words of the contract without seeing that that which was in itself a very sensible provision was the intention of both parties. And in truth, I cannot entertain a doubt that, whether that provision were held to be there or not, when it was left to the arbitrator to decide in respect of the delay which had taken place, apart from any such provision in the contract at all, it would have been perfectly competent for the arbitrator to say: "I shall not allow this or that period of delay to be made the subject of damages against the contractor when it is proved before me, as a matter of fact, that the delay which then existed was caused by the act of the railway company themselves, who were bound to provide either facilities, or material, or land, or what not, and that the delay which had taken place was not the fault of the contractor." That is manifestly the law in this country, and I believe it to be the law also in Scotland. Therefore that part of the award, both upon the construction of the language itself and upon the substance of the matter, apart from the language, seems to me to be free from objection.

No. 1.
Nov. 27, 1890.
Adams v. Great North of Scotland Railway Co.

With reference to that question, which alone appears to have invited comment by the learned Judges, I confess I am a little puzzled. The thing in itself does not speak for itself as though the award shewed that the damages were awarded by reason of the bridge not being completed, and that nevertheless, although the bridge was not completed, the portion, or any particular portion, of the works was not completed by reason of the prohibition contained in the contract to do it until the bridge was completed. In order to make the argument intelligible and sensible, and in order to arrive at the conclusion of repugnancy and unreasonableness insisted upon, I must know what the facts were. I do not know what the facts were; but the arbitrator did. I am not to assume that he was so unreasonable as to award damages in respect of a thing which was caused by the non-completion of the bridge. On the contrary, until I am compelled to come to the opposite conclusion upon the face of the award, or upon some evidence which is legitimately to be brought into the consideration of the matter, so that I can form a judgment upon it, I shall assume that the arbitrator performed his duty; and if he did perform his duty, it would be unreasonable and absurd to give damages for anything in respect of which the company themselves were really responsible. And how does it appear that he has done anything of the sort? I am totally unable to understand that. Some of the learned Judges appear to have adopted the view that the arbitrator must have awarded damages in respect of that which had not been completed by reason of the absence of the bridge. I myself have been looking at these documents carefully, and I am unable to come to any such conclusion. One learned Judge, Lord Shand, says in his judgment—"I should have been clearly of opinion that the meaning of the contract would not justify the award that he has given." If the learned Judge means by that that the contract never intended that damages should be given in respect of the non-completion of that the non-completion of which was due to the conduct of the company, I entirely agree with him; but there, as it appears to me, the fact fails. I can find no such fact as would induce me to come to the conclusion that the arbitrator has ever awarded any damages in respect of any default caused by that. Damages are awarded in respect of the delay in the completion of the whole contract, and it is extremely possible that the mere fact that the bridge was not completed was as irrelevant to the culpability of the party causing that delay as any other fact which can be imagined.

Under these circumstances it appears to me that this award is perfectly good upon the face of it. There is no evidence that I can find leading to the conclusion that the arbitrator has exceeded his jurisdiction, either in the way of leaving out what he was bound to attend to, or of inserting or considering anything which he had no jurisdiction to adjudicate upon. I am, therefore, of opinion that the award cannot be attacked upon those grounds.

With reference to the other ground, namely, corruption, which is alleged to evade the operation of the Act of Regulation, corruption, in the ordinary and popular sense of the word, is entirely repudiated by the learned counsel at the bar. It is said that what it does amount to is constructive corruption. Whether there be such a thing or not, I am not at all prepared to say. I can only say, with reference to the case which was quoted, the Bridge of Allan Waterworks case,[1] that that case stands by itself. If it ever comes for review before this House, or any case which raises such a question, I shall be prepared to express my opinion upon it. At present I can only say that the facts of that case would have entirely justified the decision, upon the ground that the arbitrator had exceeded his jurisdiction, and therefore was not exercising the function which had been given to him by statute. If it is placed upon the other ground (and I am bound to say that the interlocutor pronounced does in fact expressly refer to legal corruption), it is possible that a case raising the point may come for review before this House. All I can say at present is, that I am certainly not prepared to assent to that view when the decision itself is, upon the grounds which I have indicated, perfectly sound.

Under these circumstances, considering that the case rests on familiar principles with which we are well acquainted, and that the points are really simple ones when the matter has been explained, I am only surprised that your Lordships' time should have been occupied at any length in dealing with it; and I move your Lordships that this appeal be dismissed with costs.

LORD WATSON.—I am of the same opinion. The points raised by the appellants in this case have all been decided against them by the unanimous judgment of five learned Judges in the Court below for reasons, some of which at least, appear to me not to admit of serious controversy. The parties committed to the arbiter whom they selected the right to construe the contract between them, the right to determine all questions of fact arising between them in relation to the contract, and the right to determine the application of the law to these matters of fact.

The two points insisted on at the bar of the House were the third and the sixth objections. Now, as regards these matters, they both appear to me to involve the construction of the contract, that being a matter specially committed to the arbiter by the express terms of the submission. I do not think that any good cause has been shewn against the finding of the arbiter under the third head. On the contrary, my present impression is that the arbiter determined according to the true meaning of the contract between the parties.

Then, as regards the sixth objection, I do not concur in the expression of opinion which fell from two learned members of the Court below upon the character of the finding pronounced by the arbiter. It does not appear how the arbiter construed that particular clause of the contract which the sixth objection involves; but assuming that he construed it in favour of the appellants in this case, the question is not, in my opinion, one of construction merely; it is a question arising upon the facts of the case, and these facts have not been fully brought before the House. I do not complain of that, because I doubt the competency of submitting them to the House; but the conclusion to which I have come is, that there are many possible states of fact in regard to the completion of these works, and the want of energy shewn by the contractors in pushing them to completion, which would warrant the finding of the arbiter upon a construction of the contract favourable to the appellants.

These are sufficient grounds for disposing of the argument which we have heard, but I may be permitted to make a single observation upon that clause of the Regulations of 1695 which was referred to in argument. I need scarcely remind the House that these Regulations are of statutory force. They were enacted by Commissioners under the special sanction of an Act of Parliament. They have sometimes been referred to as an Act of Sederunt, because under the King's Royal Warrant they were directed to be engrossed in the Sederunt Book of the Court of Session at the time. The object, as I take it, of the Regulation made by the Commissioners was this—to put an end to the practice, which until that date had obtained in the Court of Session, of treating the awards of arbiters as reviewable decisions, and of setting them aside whenever, in the opinion of the Court, upon an examination of the evidence and the proceedings before the arbiter, the conclusion at which the chosen judge of the parties had arrived was either contrary to law or contrary to fact. The rule laid down is in these terms:—"That in time coming the Lords of Session sustain no reduction of any decreet-arbitral that shall be pronounced hereafter upon a prescribed submission at the instance of either of the parties submitters upon any cause or reason whatsoever, unless that of corruption, bribery, or falsehood, to be alleged against the judges-arbitrators who pronounced the same." The three grounds are "corruption," "bribery," and "falsehood"—not "corruption in the decreet-arbitral"—the expression which I find in the closed record, but "corruption," "bribery," or "falsehood" brought home to the individual judge.

Nov. 27, 1890. Adams v. Great North of Scotland Railway Co.

It has been recognised by the Court of Session, and also by noble Lords in this House, that the Regulation was never intended to go beyond the point of putting an end to the practice of review upon the merits, and of placing the award of an arbiter selected by the parties for the determination of all questions between them on precisely the same footing as the decree of a Judge Ordinary, to whose decisions finality has been attached by statute. Accordingly, both in this House and in the Court of Session, awards have been set aside upon other grounds which did not necessarily involve an investigation of the merits of the case. Want of jurisdiction is not covered by it—it is not one of the pleas which are forbidden, and an award may still be set aside on that account. Misconduct in the course of the case, whether in the proceedings which led to the award or in the award itself, is another ground with which this Regulation was never intended to deal. I think I state the law correctly when I say that it will be a good ground of reduction at the instance of either party if he is able to shew, independently of the Regulation, either that the arbiter has exceeded what are called in Scotland the fines compromissi, or that in the course of the arbitration he has disregarded any one of the express conditions contained in the contract of submission, or any one of those important conditions which the law implies in every submission. The case of Sharpe in 1817,[1] to which I alluded in the course of the argument, is a good illustration of that. Lord Eldon there refused to recognise an award as valid where the arbiter was perfectly honest—free from corruption, free from bribery, and free from falsehood—but had proceeded upon an honest error, believing that he had a joint representation from both the parties to the submission, whereas it was a representation from one only. And so in those cases where an act innocently committed by the arbiter amounts to misconduct which, in the opinion of the Court, would naturally imply that justice had not been done between the parties, the award must be set aside, not according to the Regulation, but according to those principles of law which existed before the Regulation, and which were not in the least affected by it.

I feel bound to protest against the view expressed by some of the Scottish Judges in the cases to which we have been referred at the bar with regard to what they call "constructive corruption." I suppose that as well as "constructive corruption" you may have "constructive bribery" and "constructive falsehood." The meaning of it appears to be this—that in order to satisfy the ends of justice in dealing with the validity of an award, it is necessary to invoke this constructive principle, of which I have under all circumstances the greatest distrust, and that for the purpose of doing justice it is necessary to call a man "corrupt" who is not corrupt but honest, to call a man "bribed" who never listened to an improper suggestion from any quarter, to call a man "false" who never uttered a falsehood. I do not doubt that corruption might be inferred from the terms of an award, and it is clear that if Lord Thurlow used the expression "constructive corruption" in Colquhoun v. Corbet,[1] he must have used it in that sense. Even in that case the term is inappropriate, because such corruption is actual and not constructive.

But, if you examine those cases to which we have been referred, I think it will be found that in every one of them the ground of reduction which was dignified with the name of "constructive corruption" fell within the category of cases which, as I have already explained, are entirely outside the Regulation. Take the case of Alexander,[2] which involved two points, and two points only. The first of these was whether the arbiter had committed an excess of jurisdiction by declining to entertain a claim which was laid before him in a statutory submission under the Lands Clauses Act, and which he had no power to reject. He found that the claimant was not the owner of part of the subject possessed by him and his tenants, and upon that ground alone he, having no competency whatever to deal with questions of property, having only the duty of valuing that which was submitted to him, refused to value it. The second point was that he, mistaking his duty, but in perfect honesty (for nothing else was imputed to him by the learned Judges who decided the case and set aside the award) purposely declined to put into the award a description of the subjects which he had valued, so that the omission which he had made might not appear. He did that because he thought it right; he thought he had valued all he was bound to value, and he said—"I will only put in a general description." The Court held that he had failed to do his duty under the Lands Clauses Act, although there was no imputation upon his honesty. But I see no reason whatever for calling that "constructive corruption."

In many other cases the same thing occurred. In the case of Mitchell,[3] which is perhaps the leading case in the Court below upon this branch of the law, the arbiter thought that he was bound to conclude the case without further proof from the parties, the consequence of which was that one of them, who had taken the precaution of obtaining a commission for the purpose of taking evidence abroad, had no evidence to offer, because, from no fault of his, the commission had not been executed. Under these circumstances the arbiter had proceeded upon evidence from one side only. The Court held that it was his clear duty to give an opportunity to the opposite side of bringing evidence before him, and accordingly that he had violated the principles of justice, and that justice could not be done between the parties without setting aside his award.

These are all the observations which appear to me to be necessary for the decision of the case. It humbly appears to me that the case stated at the bar for the appellants fails, inasmuch as neither the Act of Regulation, nor any one of the decisions without the Act, entitles them to have the award set aside. I therefore concur in the judgment which has been moved.

LORD BRAMWELL.—I am entirely of the same opinion, and I desire to express my hearty concurrence in what has been said by my noble and learned friend opposite (Lord Watson) about "constructive corruption." I think that that and similar expressions are only used by persons who have a desire to bring about a certain result, and do not know how to do so by the use of ordinary and intelligible expressions.

I just wish to make one other remark. I do not believe that this case would have found its way here but for the magnitude of the stake.

LORD HERSCHELL and LORD MORRIS concurred.

HUGH HOGARTH AND OTHERS (Owners of the "Westfalia") Appellants (Pursuers).—Finlay, Q.C.—D. C. Leck.
ALEXANDER MILLER, BROTHER, & COMPANY, Respondents (Defenders).—J. Gorell Barnes, Q.C.—F. W. Hollams.

Ship—Charter—Freight—Hire to cease when ship inefficient.—In a charter-party the charterer became bound to pay hire for a steam-vessel at a certain rate per month, and the owners to provide the officers and crew and stores.

It was stipulated that "in the event of loss of time from deficiency of men or stores, break-down of machinery, want of repairs, or damage, whereby the working of the vessel is stopped for more than forty-eight consecutive working hours, the payment of hire shall cease until she be again in an efficient state to resume her service."

On 30th September 1887, on a voyage from the West Coast of Africa to Harburg, the high-pressure engine broke down, and the vessel put in to Las Palmas in the Canary Isles, where she was pronounced to be unfit to proceed on her voyage. As repairs could not be effected in that port, the owners and charterers arranged to send from England a tug to bring the ship to Harburg, it being agreed that the cost should be treated as general average.

The ship arrived at the port of discharge by the use of her low-pressure engine and with the assistance of the tug. The charterer paid £867 as his share of the cost of the tug.

In an action by the shipowner against the charterer for £341, 4s. 8d., as the hire of the ship from the time she left Las Palmas with the assistance of the tug till she was discharged, held (1) (diss. Lord Bramwell, aff. judgment of Second Division) that the ship had not been "in an efficient state" for completing her voyage from the time of the accident, and that in terms of the charter-party the owner had no claim to hire for the subsequent voyage, but (2) (diss. Lord Morris, varying judgment of Second Division) that the charterers must pay hire for the full period during which she was engaged in discharging her cargo at the port of arrival, the ship being then in an efficient state for performing that part of the contract.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—The whole of this case, as it appears to me, turns upon the true construction of the contract which regulates the relations between the parties, and there are two very diverse views which have been presented to your

No. 2.
Dec. 1, 1890.
Hogarth v. Miller, Brother, & Co.

Lordships upon the true construction of the language of that instrument. I think that each part of the contract must be looked at with care, and that it must be remembered that in the construction of the contract we are not bound simply by the exact words. We must remember that it is a mercantile contract, and we must remember the nature of the subject-matter with respect to which each of the parties was contracting.

Now, the contract is for the hire of a ship, and each of the parties must be taken to know what are, in the ordinary course, the duties to be performed by a ship, and it must be taken that each party is contemplating the possibility of the benefit which he is contracting to obtain being interrupted by various causes. That clause of the contract which has to be interpreted is in these terms, and each part of it, I should say, ought to be looked at with care and with reference to the words which are found associated with it in the particular instrument which we have to construe. It is, "That in the event of loss of time." That is the leading and guiding principle by which we are to ascertain what it is with reference to which the succeeding words are used. What the hirer of the ship is guarding against by this contract with the owner of the ship is, that he is not to pay during such period of time as he shall lose (that is, lose time) in the use of the ship by reason of any of the contingencies which this particular clause contemplates,—"That in the event of loss of time from deficiency of men or stores, break-down of machinery, want of repairs or damage, whereby the working of the vessel is stopped for more than forty-eight consecutive working hours." The language is consonant with what I have indicated to be the general intention of the parties in entering into this part of the contract. In the first place, it is "in the event of loss of time," and then the parties proceed to shew that that contingency which is to give rise to the actual operation of the clause is, that the working powers of the vessel are interfered with, and "the working of the vessel is stopped for more than forty-eight consecutive working hours," and upon that there is to be a cessor.

What the parties to this contract contemplated was this:—The hirer of the vessel wants to use the vessel for the purpose of his adventure, and he is contemplating the possibility that by some of the causes indicated in the clause itself, namely, "the deficiency of men or stores, break-down of machinery, want of repairs or damage," the efficient working of the vessel may be stopped, and so loss of time may be incurred; and he protects himself by saying, that during such period as the working of the vessel is stopped for more than forty-eight consecutive hours, payment shall cease; and now come the words upon which such reliance is placed,—"until she be again in an efficient state to resume her service." If the contention which has been put forward at your Lordships' bar were well founded, one might have expected that the parties, in contemplating what upon that view was said to be the intention of the parties,—if they had intended that the test should be the efficient state of the vessel as it originally was,—might very readily have used the words "until such time as the deficiency of men or stores has been removed, or the break-down of the machinery has been set to rights, or the want of repairs has been supplied, or the damage has been remedied," and so forth; or the terms might have been inserted that the resumption of the payment should be dependent upon the vessel being restored to full efficiency in all respects as to seaworthiness and otherwise as she was at the time when she was originally handed over. But the parties have not used such language. On the contrary, the test by which the payment for the hire is to be resumed is the efficient state of the vessel to resume her service, so that each of those words, as it appears to me, has relation to that which both of the parties must be taken to have well understood, namely, the purpose for which the vessel was hired, the nature of the service to be performed by the vessel, and the efficiency of the vessel to perform such service as should be required of her in the course of the voyage.

As to the first part of the claim which has been insisted upon here, I confess that I entertain no doubt whatever that the vessel was not efficient in any sense for the prosecution of her voyage from Las Palmas to Harburg. I decline altogether to enter into the question of the contracts of insurance, with which these parties have nothing to do—I mean, have nothing to do with respect to the performance or the construction of this contract. This contract must receive the same construction whether the vessel was insured or not, and the question what other rights might have been obtained by the shipowner by supplying that which by the hypothesis he did not supply, is a question which is not before your Lordships, and upon which, at all events, I decline to express any opinion. As a matter of fact, this vessel did not and could not pursue her voyage as a vessel from Las Palmas to Harburg. That another vessel took her in tow, that another vessel accomplished the voyage and brought this vessel, not as an efficient steamer, but as a floating barge, whereby the goods were brought to Harburg, seems to me to be nothing to the purpose. I use that phrase, although I am aware that it is suggested that the low-pressure engine was used for the purpose of easing the work of the tug; that appears to me to be entirely irrelevant when one is ascertaining whether this vessel of its own independent power was efficient for the purpose of prosecuting the voyage. All that is suggested is that the tug was assisted by the use of the low-pressure engine. I find as a matter of evidence—as each Court I think has found—that the vessel was not seaworthy for the purpose of accomplishing her voyage without the assistance of a tug; she did not accomplish her voyage without the assistance of a tug; and in truth, as it appears to me, upon these facts it is clear that the voyage which was accomplished, and the service which it was contemplated this hired vessel was to perform, was performed by another vessel, and that the auxiliary assistance which she gave to that other vessel was not making the vessel herself an efficient vessel for the working of which the hirer was to pay.

It appears to me that the various hypotheses which have been put dispose of this part of the case, because the greater or less degree of efficiency of the vessel which these hypotheses have suggested appears to imply in all cases this admission, that without the additional assistance the vessel could not have accomplished that object which both the shipowner and the hirer had contemplated as being that which was to be supplied by the shipowner to the hirer. If so, how can it be said in any business sense, apart from the mere words, that the vessel was "in an efficient state to resume her service"? That being once admitted as a question of fact (and if it were not admitted I certainly should find that upon the evidence), it appears to me that she was not herself seaworthy or efficient to perform the voyage, and did not herself perform the voyage. That is conclusive upon the first part of the case, and therefore no payment for the hire was due during the period that she was passing from Las Palmas to Harburg.

With reference to the second question which has been argued, it appears to me that one has again to refer to each of these clauses of the contract to see what the parties were bargaining for. I should read the contract as meaning this, which I think one of the noble and learned Lords suggested in the course of the argument, that she should be efficient to do what she was required to do when she was called upon to do it; and accordingly, at each period, if what was required of her was to lie at anchor, if it was to lie alongside the wharf, upon each of those occasions, if she was efficient to do it at that time, she would then become, in the language of the contract, to my mind, "efficient," reading with it the other words, "for the working of the vessel." How does a vessel work when she is lying alongside a wharf to discharge her cargo? She has machinery there for the purpose. It is not only that she has the goods in the hold, but she has the machinery there for the purpose of discharging the cargo. It is not denied that during the period that she was lying at Harburg there was that machinery at work enabling the hirer to do quickly all that this particular portion of her employment required to be done. It appears to me, therefore, that at that period there was a right in the shipowner to demand payment of the hire, because at that time his vessel was efficiently working; the working of the vessel was proceeding as efficiently as it could with reference to the particular employment demanded of her at the time.

Hogarth v. Miller, Brother, & Co.

Under these circumstances it appears to me that the pursuer here was entitled to payment for the hire of the vessel during the period of discharge. That would make the pursuer entitled, I think, to a sum of £136, 4s., and for that I think judgment should be entered.

I wish to say one word as to the other view which has been presented, that the shipowner was not entitled to anything in respect of the period during which she was discharging. It has been put in various forms by the learned counsel. What reason or good sense would there be in construing a mercantile contract so that all right for payment should cease when the other party to the contract was getting everything he could out of the use of the vessel if the vessel was in an efficient state? I can see none. And what was put this morning seems to me conclusive—if some other part of the steam-gearing not used for the purpose of navigation had gone out of working in mid-ocean, and there had been no longer any use for that particular thing, the reason why such a break-down of the machinery in mid-ocean would not have created a cessor of payment under the contract would, I suppose, have been this—it would have been argued, and argued justly, "It is very true that there has been a break-down of machinery, but that break-down of machinery is not the only event contemplated, it does not of itself entitle you to a cessor of payment. There must be to entitle you to a cessor of payment a loss of time arising from a break-down of machinery. Not even then does the cessor of payment arise, but there must be a loss of time by the break-down of the machinery whereby the working of the vessel is stopped for the contracted time." That appears to me to reflect great light upon the other question—What was the break-down of the machinery which was contemplated by both parties? It appears to me that the resumption of the right to payment is correlative with that, and inasmuch as when the vessel got to Harburg the vessel became "efficient" for the purpose for which alone she was wanted at that time, it appears to me that the right to payment arose.

Now, under ordinary circumstances, when a substantial claim has been established, having been successfully prosecuted at your Lordships' bar by the pursuer or plaintiff, the result is that he shall be entitled to costs, but in this case, certainly, there are difficulties in either view of this question. For my own part it seems to me that both parties have been insisting on rights which they did not possess. The pursuer has insisted upon a right to payment during the whole period of the voyage from Las Palmas to Harburg, which I submit to your Lordships he is not entitled to. On the other hand, the charterer, the defender, has been insisting from the first that he was not bound to pay anything in respect of the period of discharge, when the pursuer was, according to the view I have presented to your Lordships, entitled to the hire of the vessel. The result of that appears to me to be that both parties have been in the wrong, and both parties have been insisting upon an affirmative case. It does not seem to me to be like the ordinary case in which the plaintiff has merely claimed too much, and has failed in proof as to some of it. It appears to be rather in the nature of two separate claims, each of the parties failing to make out one of those claims. Under those circumstances, while I move your Lordships that the interlocutor be amended by entitling the pursuer to judgment for £136, 4s., on the other hand it appears to me that the course of litigation has been such that neither of the parties is in a position to ask for costs. I therefore move your Lordships that the costs both here and below, from the original rise of this litigation to the present moment, shall not be given to either of the parties, but that each of them shall pay their own costs.

No. 2.

Dec. 1, 1890.
Hogarth v. Miller, Brother, & Co.

Lord Watson.—If the appellants were suing for freight in respect of cargo which had been safely carried to its destination notwithstanding the unseaworthiness of the ship, that consideration might have gone a long way in their favour. Such is not the nature of the claim which they prefer. They hired their ship and the services of its crew for an all-round voyage from this country to the West Coast of Africa, and thence to a home port or a port on the Continent. Hire is payable according to a monthly rate, subject to a special stipulation, which provides, in the first place, that the shipowner shall maintain the hull and machinery throughout in a thoroughly efficient condition, and in the second place, that under certain circumstances payment of hire shall cease.

The high-pressure engine of the vessel broke down on her way from Africa, and in consequence she put into the port of Las Palmas, which she reached with the aid of her low-pressure engine assisted by her sails. The parties seem to be agreed that the condition of the vessel upon her arrival there brought her within the condition of the contract as to cessor of hire. Loss of time was incurred through the break-down of the machinery, and the vessel was stopped for more than forty-eight hours, having been detained by the cause I have mentioned, before she ultimately sailed, from the 1st to the 18th of October. The appellants do not claim hire for that period. Whilst the vessel lay at Las Palmas it was found not to be expedient to repair her at that port, from want of workmen and want of materials, and accordingly an arrangement was entered into, of the details of which we know nothing beyond this, that the parties, hirers and charterers, agreed to bring her to Harburg, which was her first port of destination, at their joint expense, by means of a tug, and that the cost of bringing her should be defrayed by them on the same footing as if it had been general average loss. Accordingly the vessel sailed under tow of a tug, and reached Harburg on the 1st of November, almost in due course.

The first question which arises is this,—Was the vessel, when she started under tow for Harburg, in an efficient state to resume her service within the meaning of the contract? I have no hesitation in answering that question in the negative. The service contemplated was a service to be performed by the vessel without foreign aid, the means of propulsion through the water being her own machinery. But the fact is, that she did not proceed from Las Palmas to Harburg in that condition; she was towed; and I think that is quite sufficient to bring the whole period from her leaving Las Palmas till she reached the pier at Harburg within the terms of the condition I have referred to, and that no hire is due for that period.

Dec. 1, 1890.

Hogarth v. Miller, Brother, & Co.

It was suggested in the course of the argument that a reasonable allowance was due from the charterers in respect of the amount of use which they undoubtedly had, because their cargo was conveyed to the port of destination, and safely conveyed, in a hull which was the property of the shipowner. They had undoubtedly that use, and they had besides, to some extent, the aid during the voyage of steam-power supplied by the shipowner.

I do not mean to cast any doubt upon the suggestion that there may be circumstances, which, as matter of commercial expediency or as matter of equity, may justify the conclusion, that where a contract payment has ceased, there may, notwithstanding, be a quantum meruit due to the shipowner; but in all such cases it must be of the nature of a reasonable payment, warranted by the circumstances, in exchange for a use from which the charterer has benefited. But what are the facts here? If the shipowner had chosen to pay for a tug to tow the steamer to Harburg, and had thereby supplied at his own cost an equivalent for an efficient vessel, which his was not at the time, it may be that that would have been considered (I think it might fairly have been considered) by the Court as so substantial an equivalent for the stipulations of the contract which he had violated that he was entitled to recover hire for that period. But that equivalent was not in this case given by the shipowner—it was paid for to the extent of £860 odd by the charterers, the balance of the hire of the tug, to the amount of some £230, being borne by the shipowner. If the shipowner had at his own cost paid for the tug, he would have expended about £800 more than the hire he would have earned. On the other hand, under the arrangement which was entered into and was acted upon, the charterers have paid considerably more than double the hire which they stipulated to pay for an efficient vessel in terms of the contract. In that state of facts I cannot find any consideration which points to the propriety of making an allowance by way of quantum meruit to the appellants; and therefore I have come to the conclusion that upon this first branch of the case the judgment of the Court below is well-founded.

In regard to the second branch of the case, the claim for hire whilst the vessel was under discharge at Harburg, I have come to a different conclusion, because it appears to me, for the reasons which have been already indicated by the Lord Chancellor, that from the moment when she reached the pier at Harburg the vessel was in an efficient state to perform that part of the contract work for which she was hired, and for which she was in the possession of the respondents. Her steam-winches were in perfect order, and it humbly appears to me, that if charterers keep possession of a vessel which is in a thoroughly efficient state for all the purposes contemplated at the time by the contract, and required by them, they must, in terms of the contract, pay the stipulated hire. No doubt, on the record there is a statement made by the respondents to the effect that the discharge of the cargo proceeded leisurely, and that it was known to the defenders and their agents that the repairs would last for a considerable time. I venture to doubt whether that statement, if admitted, would afford a good answer to the claim for hire. But the evidence shews that the statement is not justified by the facts. The agent for the charterers at Harburg did everything in his power to expedite the unloading of the cargo, and it is apparent that he was not able to effect his purpose in a shorter time than was really occupied by that proceeding. Therefore, the only inference which I can draw from the evidence in this case, if it were necessary to draw it, would be this, that no more than an ordinary time, according to the circumstances of the port, was occupied at Harburg by the discharge.

No. 2.

Dec. 1, 1890.
Hogarth v. Miller, Brother, & Co.

I therefore come, upon the second point, to a conclusion adverse to the decision of the Court below. I concur, upon both points, in the judgment which has been moved by the Lord Chancellor, and also in the proposal which he has made with respect to costs.

LORD BRAMWELL.—My opinion differs from those which have been expressed by my noble and learned friends who have already addressed your Lordships, and from those opinions which are entertained by my two noble and learned friends who have not yet spoken. I said that I did not wish to hear Mr Barnes for the purpose of convincing me, because really it would be of very little use—it would make no difference in the judgment which your Lordships would pronounce, and the case is of no great consequence in point of amount, nor I should think in point of precedent—there is not very likely to be another case like this, I should think; therefore Mr Barnes was stopped on one point very much at my instance. But I must say (Mr Finlay and his junior must forgive me) that I do not know that I have heard a stronger argument in support of what they contended for than that which Mr Barnes used in support of his opposition to the other part of their case; so that practically I did hear Mr Barnes, I may say, very much in support of the opinion which I entertain, and not against it.

I cannot help thinking that most undue importance has been attached to the word "efficient." Now, I look at the meaning of this contract as being this—when there is a break-down which occasions a loss of time of a substantial character,—that is to say, for forty-eight hours at the least, during that lost time no hire shall be paid; but when there is no loss of time in consequence of that break-down, that is, no total loss through a delay, then the hire shall be paid. That is the meaning I attribute to this contract. It seems to me to be the ordinary mercantile and reasonable meaning, when you get the benefit of the ship you shall pay for its hire. Well, but it will be said they did not get the benefit of the ship on the voyage from Las Palmas to Harburg. I say they did—I say the charterer got the benefit of the ship on that voyage. It is true he paid or largely paid for a tug; I think it does not matter at all that he was insured, because the question is precisely the same as it ought to be if he had not been insured. I am of that opinion. If he thought fit to pay for the services of a tug for the purpose of accelerating the arrival of the vessel at Harburg, he thought fit to do it for his own purposes. He did not stipulate that if he did so he should not pay for the hire of the vessel; it seems to me that he ought to have done so. He might have refused to do it if he had liked—he might have said, "I have nothing to do with getting your vessel to Harburg; that is your affair"; but he thought fit to do it, and did not think fit to stipulate that in consideration of his doing it he should not pay for the hire.

It cannot be said that the vessel did not reach Harburg, for she did. It is true she was helped; and then the sort of argument used is, "she was not 'efficient'—she was not efficient for the purpose of her service." I say she was efficient sub modo, even if the word "efficient" is to be regarded, because she could do it with help. I accept what has been assumed to be true, that she was not fit to go from Las Palmas to Harburg without help; but she was fit to do it with help, and did it with help. It seems to me, as I have said before, I am afraid more than once, that an undue importance is attached to the word "efficient." I think it is an example of qui hæret in litera hæret in cortice. The substantial matter to my mind is that the charterer has got the benefit of the carriage of his goods in that ship from Las Palmas to Harburg, and ought to pay for it.

I think that is all I need say about the first point. With respect to the second point, of course, with the opinion which I entertain, I must concur in the judgment which has been moved and the opinions that have been expressed.

LORD HERSCHELL.—I concur with the view which has been put before your Lordships by the Lord Chancellor and by my noble and learned friend beside me (Lord Watson).

I do not lay any special stress upon the word "efficient" in the phrase "efficient working of the vessel." If the word "efficient" had been left out and the word "working" had been the only word there, I think I should have come to the same conclusion as that at which I have arrived. The subject-matter of this contract of hire is a steamer as a steamer, not either as a hulk to serve as a warehouse for goods, or as a vessel to be propelled without steam by means of her sails. The hire is estimated with a view to the fact that she is a steamer and that the goods are to be brought on her intended voyage or voyages during the time of the hire by the ordinary means of propulsion by which a steamer passes through the water. When therefore the vessel at Las Palmas ceased to be able to prosecute her voyage as a steamer, it appears to me that there was a breakdown of the machinery, the result of which was a stoppage of the working of the vessel; and I should come to that conclusion even though it were shewn that the vessel could have proceeded under sail. That condition of things therefore having come about, that the working of the vessel was stopped for more than forty-eight consecutive working hours, the payment of hire was to cease until she was again in an efficient state. I should have said the same if the wording had been "in a state to resume her service," her service being the carriage of goods as a steamer upon the stipulated voyages.

Now, it is said on behalf of the appellants that she did become in an efficient state as soon as she was taken in tow. I am unable to accede to that argument, if it is intended to assert by it that no matter who provides the tug, or under what circumstances she takes the vessel in tow, the vessel is to be regarded as in a condition to resume her service and so earn hire. I put, during the course of the argument, the case of this vessel being in a desperate condition, only to be saved from total loss by a salving vessel, which takes her in tow, and brings her into port, making of course for her services a large claim. Is it to be said that as soon as she was in tow of a steamer she became efficient, or became in a condition to resume her service, without looking at all at where that steamer came from or who was to pay for it? I cannot think so. I do not intend to assert that if the owner himself provided a steamer to tow the vessel into her port of destination, if he did not recover, strictly speaking, the hire under this contract, he would not be entitled to recover as for a substituted service in the same way in which, under other contracts, a shipowner who has contracted to carry goods in a particular ship on a particular voyage may recover although he does not bring them on that voyage in that ship, but tranships them and brings them in some other ship. It has never been doubted that he may, in such a case, recover in respect of the carriage of those goods. So there might have been a right (it is quite unnecessary to consider whether there would have been) of the same sort if the owner had substituted steam-power outside the vessel instead of putting the machinery into a fit state within the vessel. But that is not the case here. In the present case, the vessel having broken down, and not being in a condition to prosecute her voyage as a steamer, it is agreed between the owner of the cargo or the charterer and the shipowner that it shall be treated as a joint loss, and that the vessel shall be brought home at joint expense, treating that joint expense as a general average loss arising from a disaster in the course of the voyage. That was the arrangement come to.

Now, it seems to me that, when the vessel is brought home under an arrangement of that description, she is not really prosecuting her voyage under this contract at all, and cannot be so regarded, inasmuch as she is being brought home at joint cost by an arrangement of that description, in order to save the shipowner from inconveniences and to save the cargo owner from inconveniences; and therefore it being the interest of both parties that the vessel shall be in that way brought on, the vessel for the benefit of the shipowner, and the cargo for the benefit of the cargo owner, at their joint expense, proportioned to the value of the vessel and of the cargo respectively, I cannot regard that as in any way affording a right to a resumption of this hire, which was to be paid for the use of a steamer which could carry the goods as a steamer from the port where she took them on board to the port of her destination.

On the other point I agree with the view which has been already stated. It seems to me that it would be somewhat extravagant to hold that when a vessel has been thus by arrangement brought home, or rather brought to the port of discharge, at the joint expense, as soon as she arrives at the port of discharge you are to look back to see how she arrived there, and not rather to see what was the service then required of her, and whether she was in a condition to perform that service. It seems to me that during those ten days, whether you lay any stress on the word "efficient" or not, she was in a condition to perform the service that was required of her.

Lord Morris.—I entirely concur with the judgment which has been moved by the Lord Chancellor, and with the opinions which have been expressed by him and by my two noble and learned friends opposite (Lords Watson and Herschell), as regards that portion of the voyage for which hire is claimed, namely, the part of it between Las Palmas and Harburg. But I am further of opinion that the pursuer is not entitled to recover anything.

In order to arrive at a conclusion upon this case, I think it necessary to refer to the charter-party. It appears to me that in the argument of this case in the Court in Scotland and before this House there has been some confusion between what would be the rights of the parties in the earning of freight, and under the contract contained in this charter-party for the hire of this steam vessel out-and-out. The first portion that I would refer to is at the conclusion of the appellants' case: "That the owners agree to let, and the charterers agree to hire the said steamship for a voyage" afterwards mentioned—that is, a voyage from certain ports mentioned to the West Coast of Africa and back again—"she being ready to receive cargo, with a clear hold, and being tight, staunch, strong, and every way fitted for the service."

Now, the first question which I would ask is, What is the service contemplated there? The service contemplated there is her being a steamship fitted in all respects to go from the ports mentioned to the West Coast of Africa and back again. She was to be a vessel fit for that service. The clause proceeds on the assumption that she was fitted for the service at the starting; it provides that "the owners shall maintain her in a thoroughly efficient state in hull and machinery for the service." What service? The service of being a steamship fit to go from the ports which are defined in the concluding paragraph.

I now come to the clause in question, and I agree with my noble and learned friend who has preceded me (Lord Herschell), that we should not give any peculiar importance to the word "efficient." I shall use it as if the word "fit" were used. The clause in question is, "That in the event of loss of time from deficiency of men or stores, break-down of machinery, want of repairs, or damage, whereby the working of the vessel is stopped for more than forty-eight consecutive working hours, the payment of hire shall cease until she be again in an efficient state to resume her service." I read, as I have said, "fit" for "efficient," "until she shall be in a fit state to resume her service." What service? The service contemplated of being a steamship which was originally fit to go from certain ports to the West Coast of Africa and back again. The owner contracted, under the second clause to which I have referred, to keep her in that efficient, or, if you will, fit, state to perform that service, namely, to go to the West Coast of Africa and back again. But as the owner would only be liable under the clause in an action for damages, the parties very wisely chose to measure their damages, and accordingly the measure is that the hire is to cease on the contingency of there being "a loss of time from a deficiency of men or stores, break-down of machinery, want of repairs, or damage, whereby the working of the vessel is stopped for more than forty-eight consecutive working hours, until she be again in a" fit "state to resume her service." I say that I read for "efficient" "fit" only. What service? She was to be a vessel which was fit to go on certain voyages described in the concluding portion of the clause. Now, was she that? On the portion of the voyage from Las Palmas to Harburg she was clearly unable to do it. When was the moment that she again became fit? Nothing was done to her to make her fit on the first day of the discharge. When did the period begin at which she was again fit for the performance of "that service," namely, the service between these ports? I say, only upon the day when she was put by repairs into a state in which she was fit to perform the voyages which she was originally required to perform, and in which state the owner undertook that she should be during the whole period.

For these reasons, I, of course, concur with the judgment of the Lord Chancellor and of my two noble and learned friends opposite with regard to the portion of the voyage from Las Palmas to Harburg. But I have also come to the conclusion that the pursuer is not entitled to any portion of the sum which he has claimed. The Court in Scotland appear to have given the sum of £60 in a vague sort of way. I am of opinion that if the pursuer is entitled to anything he is entitled to payment for the entire ten days occupied in the discharging, and that we cannot go into the question of dawdling in the discharge. But I am of opinion that he is entitled to nothing; and therefore I do not agree with the view which has been expressed by the majority of your Lordships that the interlocutor of the Court of Session in Scotland should be amended as proposed.

INTERLOCUTOR of 15th March 1889 varied by inserting therein £136, 4s. instead of £60, and by deleting the words "Find the pursuers liable to them in expenses, remit to the Auditor to tax the same, and to report," and by inserting therein the words "Find neither party entitled to expenses," &c.: Cause remitted to Court of Session: No costs allowed to either party in respect of the appeal.

Reparation—Slander—Innuendo—Ironical meaning attachable to words.—A person who conceived that his reputation had been unfairly attacked through questions put by a Member of Parliament in the House of Commons, wrote to him, and sent to a newspaper a letter in which he denied the charges alleged against himself. He went on to put the case that he should induce one of the political opponents of the member addressed to put questions in the House of Commons implying that that member had had delirium tremens, and had been intoxicated in public. Such a course, the writer stated, would be as justifiable as the conduct of the Member of Parliament had been to him. In his letter he also spoke of his illustrations of delirium tremens and drunkenness as "imaginary stories," adding "it is doubtless painful for you to hear of these stories as it is painful for me to imagine them true for the sake of bringing home to your mind the impropriety of your unfair questions." In an action of damages at the instance of the Member of Parliament against the proprietor of the newspaper in which the letter was published, held (aff. judgment of the First Division) that the pursuer was entitled to an issue whether the letter represented him as a drunkard; that meaning being capable of being put upon the letter, and it being for a jury to say whether there was or was not a libel.

Ld. Herschell. Lord Watson. Lord Macnaghten. Ld. Bramwell. Lord Morris. Lord Hannen.

The defenders appealed, and argued that the primary meaning of the letter was not libellous, and that it was necessary for the pursuer to have averred facts and circumstances which gave it a different meaning to entitle him to an issue.

LORD HERSCHELL.—This is an appeal from an interlocutor in which it was held that in an action for libel brought by the respondent against the appellants there was an issue fit and proper to be submitted to a jury. The only question which your Lordships have to consider is whether that determination of the Court of Session was correct. All that has been decided is that there is such an issue which the jury will have to consider and determine, and there is no controversy about the law which governs a case of this description. If the statements or letter which is charged to be libellous be of such a nature that it is capable of a construction which would be libellous in point of law, if it contains matter which is capable of such a construction that it might be read by reasonable men as libellous in point of law, then it is for the jury to determine whether a case has been made out, and the Court cannot stop the case at its inception, and prevent a verdict of a jury. The question therefore resolves itself into one of simple construction,—what interpretation might reasonably be put upon the document in question. I believe all your Lordships are agreed that the Court below was right in coming to the conclusion that the case could not be withdrawn from the jury, and that it was right to direct an issue. That being so, it would be obvious that there are reasons for not giving a detailed statement of the views which have led your Lordships to that conclusion, inasmuch as if the case is to be tried before a jury, the reasons which would be given by your Lordships would be arguments which might be regarded in the light of prejudging the very question which would have to be determined by a jury. Therefore I do not propose to give any reasons for the conclusion at which I have arrived, which is, that the letter is capable of being understood in a libellous sense, and that, therefore, it is for the jury to determine whether there is a libel or not. For these reasons I move that the judgment be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs.

LORD WATSON.—I entirely concur. I desire to express no opinion as to whether these letters are libellous. All that my judgment implies is that there is a question which a jury and not the Court ought to try.

LORD BRAMWELL, LORD MACNAGHTEN, LORD MORRIS, and LORD HANNEN concurred, and the appeal was dismissed with costs.

Bank of Scotland v. Dominion Bank.

BANK OF SCOTLAND, Appellants (Defenders).—Finlay, Q.C.—Murray.
DOMINION BANK, Respondents (Pursuers).—Att.-Gen. Sir R. Webster—D.-F. Balfour, Q.C.

Bill—Payment and discharge—Cancellation without authority—Liability of agent employed to collect bill.—The agent of a bank offered to try to obtain payment of a bill which had been protested for non-payment, and the holders accepted the offer. The acceptors offered to pay the bill and the protest charges on the condition that they should not be called upon to pay interest and expenses. The bank's agent communicated this condition to the holders, and without waiting for authority took payment of the bill and protest charges, marked the bill paid, and delivered it to the acceptors, who deleted their names thereon. Thereafter the holders intimated their refusal to agree to the condition on which payment had been made, refused to accept the sum tendered to them by the agent of the bank, and received back the bill cancelled, the money being repaid to the acceptors. The holders then raised an action against the acceptors for the amount of the bill, with interest, and for the expenses of the action, and obtained decree, but the estates of the acceptors became bankrupt before diligence could be used against them.

The holders thereupon raised an action against the bank, concluding for the amount of the bill, with interest, and for the expenses of their action against the acceptors. Held (aff. judgment of First Division) that the evidence shewed that if the bill had not been cancelled through the error of the agent of the bank, the holders might have recovered payment by summary diligence before the acceptors had become bankrupt, and that the bank was liable.

EARL OF SELBORNE.—I confess it is with some regret—because I think the case is rather a hard one upon the Bank of Scotland—that I feel myself compelled to come to the conclusion that the judgment in this case is right, though I think it should be amended, without prejudice to the costs of the appeal, by introducing words which will require effect to be given to the offer which was made in the Inner-House to subrogate the appellants to any right and remedy which may remain upon the bill against the drawers.

In the view which I take of the case it may be put thus—First of all, has there been a loss sustained? It appears to me clear that there has been a loss, arising no doubt immediately out of the bankruptcy of the judgment debtor; and for this purpose I cannot but think myself that this case should be dealt with upon the footing of the right of the holder of the bill against the acceptor, and without drawing in any question as to whether an action against the drawers in Canada might have been successful or not, or to what extent; but that there has been an actual loss arising immediately from the bankruptcy of the judgment debtor, and that the measure of that loss prima facie is that which the Court below have assumed, namely, the whole debt minus the interest, appears to me to be unquestionably clear.

Then what was the cause of that loss? I think myself, upon the evidence (differing here from Lord Mure, but agreeing with the rest of the Court), that the cause of the loss was the delay of the remedy—I mean the summary remedy which would have existed if the bill had not been on the face of it cancelled. I cannot think that more evidence as to the possibility of having made that summary remedy effectual, if it existed, than that which was given, can be required. The debtor was a man engaged in business, carrying on business, paying his way, and paying considerably larger sums, according to the evidence, than that in question until some considerable time after the action was brought, and it appears that on the 12th of July 1887 (a matter which is not noticed by Lord Mure in his judgment) a positive offer was made to pay down immediately—that is, the next day—the whole principal sum due upon the bill on the condition of the waiver of the right to the interest.

I will consider hereafter whether the refusal of that offer has any effect upon the pursuers' right; but I think that in that state of circumstances your Lordships must come to the conclusion that, so far as appears, there would be every reason to assume that payment would have been made but for the question which was raised as to the interest; and if the summary remedy had been available at that time it cannot be doubted, from the correspondence which then took place, that it would have been immediately resorted to; and, as I understand it, the law of Scotland is, that if a party is let in to defend in such a case, it must be upon the terms of consigning the amount claimed, or at least giving good security for it. Therefore, I cannot but think that prima facie the loss is proved, and is due to the delay of the remedy, because it is not suggested that the action was not proceeded with as rapidly as it could have been, or that there was any default of any sort or kind in prosecuting it on the part of the pursuers.

That brings us to the question, what was the cause of the loss of that summary remedy? If we find that it was due to a wrongful act on the part of the defenders, I cannot but think that the loss was the direct consequence of that wrongful act. The cause was beyond all doubt the cancellation of the bill—that is to say, the perforation of it as paid, which was the act of the defenders by their agent Mr. Mackenzie, and also the simultaneous erasure of the signature by the acceptor. Then the sole question, as it strikes my mind, is, whether that was a wrongful act or not? If it was a wrongful act when it was done, I am afraid the consequence is that the defenders must be liable for the loss occasioned.

Now, in determining whether it was a wrongful act or not, I think that we must look to what took place upon the 13th of June 1887, and not at what might or might not possibly have taken place if action had been taken upon letters which passed at an earlier date. And what did take place on the 13th of June? This, that the principal money and the amount of certain small charges were paid to Mr Mackenzie, the agent of the Bank of Scotland, on a certain condition. That condition was that there should be an express renunciation or waiver of any further claim for that which was not paid—in other words, that payment of part of the debt should be accepted and the rest discharged, and that positively, by an express engagement. Both Mr Mackenzie, representing the Bank of Scotland, and Mr Anderson, who made the payment, knew perfectly well that there was no authority to accept payment upon those terms, because the letters written contemporaneously, which, in my opinion, must be taken to represent the true effect of the actual transaction (and I should think so even independently of a circumstance not altogether immaterial, namely, that the Bank of Scotland were also the bankers of Anderson the debtor), shew that the true effect is that it was a conditional payment, made upon those conditions, and whatever other condition the preceding correspondence might possibly have authorised such a payment to be received upon, it did not authorise the acceptance of the payment upon those conditions. The letters prove it distinctly, the whole sequel of the correspondence proves it, and Anderson's letters previous to that date shew that the thing was deliberate, and that he never would have paid upon any other terms; and the letter of Mr Mackenzie proves that he knew perfectly well that there was no previous authority to accept payment upon those terms, and that if those terms were not accepted the payment could not in good faith, or in point of law either I should say, be retained. Consequently, the terms not being accepted, the payment was returned, and re-delivery of the bill asked for.

Now, the question to my mind is, could it possibly be justifiable under those circumstances, and upon such conditional payment being made, instanter to cancel the bill, to perforate it as paid, and to stand by while the signature of the acceptor is erased by him and leave it so in his hands? To me it is perfectly plain that until the terms were accepted and the condition assented to, it could not be consistent with the duty of the bank to part with the bill or to permit it to be tampered with. It might have been put in medio under some reasonable arrangement, leaving it in a condition in which it might be returned as it was before when the money was returned if the condition was not accepted. That, however, was not done, and I cannot think it is any answer to the case so made to say that a somewhat ambiguous letter (but which for the purpose I will assume to be clear), as it seems to me to be, had been written upon the 7th of June, the effect of which, especially when taken in connection with Mr Gordon's evidence, seems to shew that the National Bank, the agents of the creditor, would have been willing to accept payment of the same amount upon other terms,—upon the terms either of something being done expressly to save the right to claim and recover the interest due and not paid, with any other charges which might lawfully be made, or at least to leave that question untouched by any express waiver or agreement or renunciation. I do not think it necessary to go into the question what the true construction and effect of that letter would have been if it had been treated at the time as an authority to deliver up the bill upon payment of that sum, because the transaction did not follow upon it. There may have been perhaps some difference of view between the National Bank of Scotland and Mr Mackenzie as to the effect of that letter. Whichever was right or whichever was wrong, one thing is to my mind quite clear from all that followed, namely, that the National Bank of Scotland did not mean to renounce that upon the renunciation of which Mr Anderson distinctly insisted; and on the other hand, that Mr Anderson would not and did not make any payment except upon the terms of that renunciation, which was never agreed to, and was never intended to be agreed to.

Then that being, as it appears to me, the whole substance of the case, I cannot but say that I am unable to follow the argument founded on the fact that on the 13th of June, and at a later date, on the 12th of July, payment of part was offered on condition that the rest was remitted or renounced. I cannot see how if at the time that those proposals were made there was no obligation to accept them, the fact of the ultimate loss can be affected, or that loss reduced, by reason of those proposals. If they ought to have been accepted, it would be quite a different thing, but can anyone seriously say that either in a question with the agent to collect, or in a question with the principal debtor, the principal debtor has a right to reduce the amount of the debt, or that the agent to collect has a right to keep the amount of the debt as reduced by an offer to pay less than the whole? Though the amount of the difference may not be very large, yet if the tender was not such a tender as should have been accepted, and such as there was an obligation to accept, I am at a loss to see how it can affect the ultimate result.

On these grounds—and I think it unnecessary to say more—I have come to the conclusion that the Court of Session was right, and that your Lordships should affirm their judgment, and that with costs, altering the interlocutor only by adding the words which will be necessary to make it part of the judgment that there is to be an assignation to the appellants of any remedy competent to the respondents against the drawers of the bill of exchange, and I move your Lordships accordingly.

Lord Watson.—I am of the same opinion upon all of the points which have been dealt with by the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack.

The letters containing the authority or instructions sent by the National Bank in London to the agent of the Bank of Scotland at Grangemouth are certainly expressed in terms somewhat loose, and if, following out the authority given by these letters, Mr Mackenzie had bona fide, as the authorised agent of the National Bank, entered into a final and binding arrangement with Mr Anderson which could by some reasonable construction of these letters have been justified, I should not have been prepared to construe the letters very strictly against Mr Mackenzie or the bank which he represented. I think that they would have admitted of very considerable latitude. But what Mr Mackenzie actually did do on the 13th of June 1887 was not anything of that kind. He then made an arrangement which he knew he had not power to make finally; he made that which was known to him to be a provisional arrangement, because a condition insisted upon as essential by Mr Anderson, and without the concession of which Mr Anderson would make no arrangement at all, was known to Mr Mackenzie to be one to which the National Bank had given him no authority to consent, and accordingly, in reporting the arrangement, he called the attention of the bank to that fact, and points out that it is made a sine qua non by Mr Anderson.

Now, the subsequent letters shew that it was quite within Mr Mackenzie's view that the arrangement was provisional, and that it was within the competency of the Dominion Bank or their agents in London to assent to it or not, and that its completion entirely depended upon their giving their assent. That was all very right and proper, and I think to that extent no fault can be found with Mr Mackenzie's action. But the matter in which he did exceed his powers and commit a legal wrong was in relation to the mutilation of the bill. He had no right to alter that document, to perforate the signature, or to permit any other person to interfere with the document—a document which was the property of the Dominion Bank, and remained so. I say he had no right to allow anybody to do that so long as the bank had not intimated their assent to the arrangement under which alone either Mr Mackenzie or any other person had the right to mark it as discharged.

I do not see any reason whatever to doubt that in that view of the case the result which followed was the direct and necessary result of that wrongful act. I think the judgment of the Court below is right and ought to be affirmed, with the variation suggested by the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack.

Lord Bramwell.—I am of the same opinion. I am very much inclined to think that the construction put by the appellants upon the letter of June the 7th is the right one, and if nothing else had happened except that, and Mackenzie had been content to take the principal without interest, I am very much inclined to think that he would have been justified in giving up the bill to be cancelled, and in point of fact I believe that was the agreement which he originally made with Anderson. But whether from a feeling of goodwill to Anderson, who was a customer of the bank, or from any other consideration, he told the National Bank that that was not all that took place between them, because he in effect told them that Anderson's letter was a truthful one, and that he had taken the money upon the footing that the Dominion Bank was to have no further claim in respect of the bill. It is very ingeniously argued that that really did not add to what would have been the case if nothing had been said expressly about the Dominion Bank having no further claim in respect of the bill. I am sure I do not know about that, but it took away from the Dominion Bank the power of trying whether they had such further right, and it therefore, if it really had been agreed to, was an excess of authority on the part of Mackenzie, and I think that he is precluded from saying that that was not really agreed to, although in fact I doubt extremely whether it was, for I doubt whether Mr Galloway's evidence is not right.

If that is so, Mr Mackenzie added a term to the agreement with Anderson which he had no authority to add, and therefore he acted without authority in giving up the bill in pursuance of an agreement which he had no authority to make. That is the first position.

I have had a misgiving, I own, whether the damage arising from the inability of the Dominion Bank to have recourse to the summary procedure, and the intervening bankruptcy of Anderson, was damage naturally arising out of the wrong thing which Mackenzie did. But I cannot but think that some damages arose from it, and although it can hardly be said to be a natural consequence of the wrong that Mackenzie did, and of the mistake which he made, yet the insolvency of Anderson and the necessary delay in the procedure together undoubtedly caused a loss of money—at least I think upon the evidence (with all submission to Lord Mure) that it would have been recovered if there had been the possibility of summary procedure. I had a strong opinion that the pursuers had not made out their damages, because they had left it in uncertainty what they would recover, if anything, from the drawers of the bill, but that difficulty is got over by what I understand can be done in the decree which can be pronounced now. But I should just like to make this suggestion. The bill may be handed over to the appellants, but ought there not to be some provision by which they should be enabled to prove notice of dishonour to the drawers of this bill, which no doubt was given by the Dominion Bank in Canada? I should think there ought to be some provision or arrangement by which the Dominion Bank should undertake to enable the present appellants to prove all that the Dominion Bank could have proved to enable themselves to recover. Whether that can in any way be done or not, I am sure I do not know. I merely make the suggestion that in some way or other it ought to be done or agreed to.

Lord Herschell.—I am of the same opinion. I do not propose to trouble your Lordships with any observations as to the effect of the letter of the 7th of June. I think it quite possible that under the terms of that letter the Bank of Scotland would have been entitled to receive from Anderson the principal and the small charges without commission or interest, and to take them from him possibly (I do not wish to determine that point at all) without making any reservation whatever, nothing being said on either side, if Anderson had been content to make the payment on these terms. But it is clear to my mind that Anderson never was content to make the payment on these terms. Whether he shared a common mistake with the National Bank or not, it seems to me manifest that he always insisted that he would only make payment of the principal if there were a distinct and express renunciation by the holders of the bill of their remedy in respect of anything further. I do not see any ground for thinking that he ever receded from that position. He had taken it from the outset, he took it on the 9th of June, and I cannot myself see any ground for supposing that he did not take it on the 13th, inasmuch as it was embodied in the letter which he wrote on that day.

Now, as I have said, I will assume that if Mr Mackenzie had handed over the bill after he got the letter of the 7th June, and had received the principal and the 12s. 6d., the other small charges, no complaint could have been made. But that did not take place. Anderson was not willing that it should take place, because Anderson said—"I am not content with that; I want an express renunciation." Then on the 13th I think it must be taken as against Mackenzie (and I have no doubt myself that it was the fact, but even if it was not the fact it must be so taken as against Mackenzie) that that was the transaction, because it is upon those terms alone that he sends up the draft to London.

Now, the ground upon which I base my judgment in the case is this, that where a banker is employed to receive payment of a bill from the acceptor, and receives payment from him clogged with a condition, without assent to which the holder is not entitled to retain the money paid, I think the banker cannot be entitled to treat such conditional payment as if it were an absolute payment, and to cancel the bill as paid before he has received the assent to the condition. It seems to me that where he has transmitted the money to his principal upon the distinct terms that that principal cannot be justified in keeping it absolutely and in all events, but can only keep it properly if he assents to a condition imposed by the letter remitting it, then he was bound to hold in his own hands, untouched and untampered with, the acceptance sent him for collection until he had ascertained whether his principal was willing to assent to the condition or not. Not having done so in this case, it seems to me that he has committed a breach of duty, from which the damage sued for has resulted.

THE interlocutor of the Inner-House was varied by adding thereto, after the words "refuse the reclaiming note," the following words, —"and the pursuers having undertaken to assign to the defenders any remedy which they may have against the drawers of the bill of exchange of the 28th of September 1886, order such assignation to be duly made, and the said bill of exchange to be delivered up to the defenders for the purposes thereof, upon payment by the defenders to the pursuers of the amount decerned in this action": Subject to such variation, interlocutors appealed from affirmed, with costs.

North British Railway Co. v. Wood.

NORTH BRITISH RAILWAY COMPANY, Appellants (Defenders).—Finlay, Q.C.—Haldane, Q.C.
JOHN WOOD, Respondent (Pursuer).—Rhind—Baxter.

Discharge—Reparation—Damages for personal injury.—A commercial traveller, who had been injured in a railway accident, accepted a sum of £27 from the railway company, and granted them a receipt bearing that that sum was accepted by him "in full of all claim competent" to him in respect of injury and loss sustained by him in the accident in question. About eighteen months after granting this receipt he raised an action of damages against the company concluding for £5000. The company pleaded that in respect of the terms of the receipt they were entitled to be assoilzied.

In a proof evidence was led—as to the pursuer's state of mind and body at the time of granting the receipt, and at the time of the proof—as to the intention of parties in giving and taking the receipt, and—as to the capacity of the pursuer to understand it. The pursuer at the time of granting the receipt had been visited by the railway company's surgeon, but not by any surgeon employed by himself. He had no external injuries, but had sustained a nervous shock. He had no legal advice, and the receipt was granted nine days after the accident. The Lord Ordinary awarded him £500, and to this judgment the Second Division adhered.

The House of Lords, being of opinion that the writing signed by the pursuer was a discharge, that there had been no attempt on the part of the railway company to mislead the pursuer, that he was capable of understanding the meaning of the writing, and that there had been no understanding between him and the person who acted for the company that there was any reservation of claims made by the pursuer at the time the discharge was granted, reversed these judgments and assoilzied the defenders.

AN action was raised in January 1890 by John Wood, who had been a commercial traveller, against the North British Railway Company, concluding for £5000 of damages in respect of injuries which he alleged he had suffered by an accident which occurred on the defenders' line of railway on 21st June 1888.

The accident was peculiar. The train in which the pursuer was travelling met a goods train coming in the opposite direction loaded with pit-props. These props projected over the side of the goods train, broke through the side of the carriage in which the pursuer was travelling, and finally stopped the passenger train with some violence. The pursuer averred that he had received "a great and permanent injury to his nervous system."

On 30th June the pursuer had given to a clerk in the employment of the defenders, who had visited him with the view of settling his clai-a receipt in the following terms, viz.:—"Received by me, John Wood, commission-agent, Doune, from the North British Railway Company, the sum of £27 sterling, which sum I hereby accept in full of all claim competent to me in respect of injury and loss sustained by me in an accident on the said railway, at or near Bonnybridge Station, on or about the 21st June 1888, and also in full of all expenses of every kind incurred by me in connection therewith. Paid 30th June 1888." The receipt was printed except the parts in italics, which were in writing.

The railway company, besides disputing the severity of the pursuer's injuries, founded on this receipt as a discharge which excluded the action.

The pursuer in answer (1, 2, and 3) . . . "admitted that the pursuer took the £27, and gave the receipt. It does not discharge, and was not understood by the pursuer to discharge, his right to make any further claim against the defenders. The defenders' representative assured the pursuer that he was suffering only from a slight nervous shock, and that he would be all right in a week or two. The pursuer had no one to consult, either agent or doctor. As the event has turned out, he is helpless for life. Admitted that the first time the pursuer threatened an action was November 1889. Explained that, shortly after the accident, and in consequence of it, the pursuer's mind became seriously affected."

The pursuer proposed the ordinary issue of fault, and also this issue, viz.:—"Whether, when the pursuer signed the receipt mentioned in the record, he understood that he thereby discharged his claims against the defenders in full?"

Lord Kinnear (Ordinary) reported the case to the Second Division,* who of consent of parties remitted to the Lord Ordinary to allow a proof before determining the effect of the discharge, and proof was accordingly led before the Lord Ordinary.

From this proof it appeared that the pursuer was visited twice by the surgeon of the railway company, Dr Heron Watson, who reported to them on each occasion in the terms quoted below by Lord Selborne. These visits took place on 21st and 22d June. On 23d June Mr William Wood, acting for the railway company, called on the pursuer and invited him to call on his uncle, Mr Peter Wood, the official of the railway company whose duty it was to attend to such claims. Mr William Wood on 23d June also wrote this letter to the pursuer, viz.:—"On my return I explained to Mr Wood the purport of what passed between us to-day, and mentioned that you might be along to see him on Monday. He informs me that he will be at his office between 10 A.M. and 5 P.M., and if you come and make a reasonable demand, in keeping with Professor Watson's report, there ought to be no difficulty in coming

* "NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary reports this case, because, while he thinks that a relevant case has been stated, and that the action ought not to be dismissed, he is unable to approve of one of the issues proposed by the pursuer.

"The first issue is in ordinary terms, and is admittedly a proper issue, if the pursuer has not discharged his claims. But he has granted a discharge, whereby he accepts of the sum of £27 'in full of all claims competent to him in respect of injury and loss sustained' by him in consequence of the accident on the North British Railway, of which he now complains. The defenders, founding upon his discharge, plead that the action cannot be maintained, because the pursuer's claim has been settled and paid.

"The pursuer may be entitled to set aside the discharge if it was impetrated by the defenders, or if it was granted under error induced by the representations of their agent. But under the issue he proposes, he would be entitled to a verdict on the ground of a mere mistake on his own part, for which the defenders were in no way responsible."

to an amicable settlement. . . ." The pursuer did not call, but subsequently on 30th June Mr William Wood called again on him with the receipt and the money. The pursuer took the money, and filled up and signed the receipt. Mrs Black, the pursuer's sister, and her husband, with whom he was then living, were both present at this interview.

It was matter of dispute whether at this last meeting anything was said by the pursuer which was intended by him to reserve any claims against the company, if his injuries should turn out more serious than was then anticipated, and which must have been understood by William Wood to import such a reservation. The state of the pursuer's intelligence on the occasion was also matter of dispute. For the import of the evidence on the matter reference is made to Lord Selborne's opinion, the substance of that opinion being that there was no evidence of any such reservation having been expressed, or of any lack of intelligence on the part of the pursuer. The pursuer had not at this time consulted either a doctor or a law-agent.

Evidence was also led as to the pursuer's mental and bodily state, both as at the date of the proof, and as shortly after the accident. There were no external injuries, and the suggestion of the pursuer was that he had suffered a mental or nervous shock, which had permanently injured his health.

On 22d July 1890 the Lord Ordinary decerned against the defenders for £500. His Lordship issued no note or opinion.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued, in the first place, founding on the case of the Victorian Railway Commissioners v. Coultas (1888, L. R., 13 App. Ca. p. 222), that no damages could be recovered, in respect that there was no physical injury, but merely fright and nervous shock. On proceeding to argue the question of the effect of the discharge, the junior counsel for the defenders admitted that, assuming the state of mind and body of the pursuer to have been such as to warrant the award of £500 of damages, the company would not be justified in standing on the discharge. Senior counsel, however, subsequently in his argument contended that the discharge ended the matter.

* The following opinions were delivered :—

"Lord Justice-Clerk.—I do not think it necessary to consider in this case the questions raised in the case of Victorian Railways Commissioners v. Coultas. In that case the question was whether a person suffering from fright alone could claim damages. If any opinion required to be expressed upon that case I should like time for further consideration, but there is nothing similar to that case in the present.

"The accident here was a very deplorable one indeed. Some pit-props were being carried on a railway waggon, and while the waggon was passing the carriage of a passenger train going in the opposite direction, one of these props suddenly crashed through the door of the carriage. In fact it got so fixed that it could not be removed without considerable force. There were eight persons in the carriage. One of them says that he received a severe shock, from the effects of which he is still suffering. The defenders say he cannot have received anything more than a mental shock, because the other people in the carriage did not receive any injury. I do not understand that. Whether a person in a carriage, through the door of which a pit-prop has forced its way, received a physical shock or not is not determined by the fact that others received no shock. It may depend upon the position at the time of the person said to be injured. I see no ground for differing from the opinion of the Lord Ordinary that this man received a physical shock, and if so, he is entitled to compensation.

"The question in this case is, whether he is barred from recovering further

The defenders appealed.

In their appeal case the defenders submitted, in the first place, that the damages from the railway company by having accepted £27 in lieu of all claims a few days after the accident? Now, it was not maintained by Mr Dickson that if it turned out after such a discharge had been taken that the injuries actually received were of such a nature as not to have been in the contemplation of the parties when the settlement was made, and that the amount paid was quite inadequate, the pursuer would be barred by such settlement from suing for the actual damage sustained. All he maintained was, that if the pursuer took £27 his injuries could not have been so serious as he now seeks to make them out to have been. But that cuts both ways, for if he was relieved from anxiety by being paid at once, he should have recovered rapidly if he was not really seriously injured. There is nothing more common in these cases of shock than to hear doctors declare that it is the anxiety of the litigation which prevents recovery.

"The next question is, has he recovered? Some of the doctors say he has completely recovered. He is still to some extent suffering from the injuries. His own doctor finds certain symptoms which the other doctors do not find, but these are just the circumstances which the Lord Ordinary was entitled to form his own opinion upon. He has considered these matters, and has given the pursuer £500. It is a large sum, but the only question is, whether if it was in his province to grant it we should cut it down. I regard the question as if this sum had been awarded by a jury. I do not think we should have ordered a new trial, on the ground of excessive damage, had the award been given by a jury.

"Lord Young.—I have all along regarded this case as one of considerable interest and importance, because it is certain that railway companies are not seldom victimised. Here the pursuer was in the train to which the accident occurred, and he says he sustained a severe shock. He had little or nothing to shew in support of that statement at the time, and he accepted £27, and granted a receipt as for all he could demand from the company. A year or more afterwards he brought an action for £5000 for injuries sustained, and it is not surprising that the action should be defended, and every plea competent to the defenders urged against it. The case came before us first upon the question of the discharge, and considering the state of the pursuer, and the alleged circumstances in which the receipt was granted, we thought that the case should be sent for trial before determining the effect of the discharge. The parties very wisely agreed that the case should be determined by the Lord Ordinary without a jury. We now have before us the evidence taken before the Lord Ordinary, and the judgment pronounced upon it. As he has thought £500 a proper sum to award, I am not prepared to hold that the pursuer is barred by accepting £27. The question we have to determine is, whether we should interfere with that judgment? It has come to be a question of damages, and of damages only. The accident is admitted. It is admitted that the pursuer received some injuries through the fault of the defenders. Now, the amount of damages turns upon whether the pursuer was pretending injury or not. If he was not, a sum of £27 is absurd. The Lord Ordinary thought he was not pretending injury, and awarded him £500. I think there is evidence which reasonably supports that view, and I am not for altering the judgment. Whether another view might not have been taken, and reasonably supported by the evidence, I do not say.

"Lord Rutherfurd Clark.—I have had some difficulty about this case, but I agree that we should adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. I do not think, however, that we are in precisely the same position as if we were considering the question of granting a new trial. We have more power here in dealing with the judgment. The case turns entirely upon the question of whether or not the witnesses for the pursuer are to be believed. The Lord Ordinary has believed them, and I see no reason for saying that I disbelieve them, and no ground for altering the judgment."

respondent's demand was excluded by the document signed by the pursuer. The proof allowed was, as Lord Young explained, allowed on the footing that the facts should be brought out "before determining the effect of the discharge." Now, however, that the proof had been led, the appellants maintained as to the said document (1) that its terms were such as to exclude the respondent's claim; (2) that the respondent's statements challenging the effect of the document were not relevant. They were only pertinent to an action of reduction, but the appellants did not desire to found on the form of action, and were willing to deal with the case as if they had been stated in an action of reduction; and (3) that on the proof the respondent had not established his averments as to the document, even if these averments were relevant.

The pursuer maintained;—Both in England and Scotland the granting of a receipt for money contained in an informal discharge had been held not to be a bar to an action of damages. Inquiry had been allowed into the circumstances under which the document was signed in order to see whether effect should be given to it as a final and binding settlement.[1] In the present case there was no consensus in idem placitum, and, in the words of Mr Justice Mellish in Lee v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company,[2] "the receipt does not state an agreement or purport to bind either of the parties to any terms whatever." In that case the receipt was in similar terms to the present. Reference was also made to Roberts v. The Eastern Counties Railway Company.[3]

EARL OF SELBORNE.—I think all your Lordships are likely in this case to agree that the judgment appealed from cannot be maintained. One always feels a certain degree of compassion for persons who have suffered injuries of this description, if it turns out that the compensation which they have been content to receive is apparently inadequate to the amount of the injury, but I cannot think, my Lords, that this is a proper ground on which to proceed if the parties have really and bona fide come to an accord and satisfaction with each other. I cannot help thinking that the consideration of the apparent inadequacy subsequently ascertained of the remuneration had very considerable weight with the Court of Session. In one of the judgments (Lord Young's I think) it is very prominently put forward, but with the greatest respect to that learned Judge and to the others who may have concurred in that view, I cannot bring myself to adopt it. I think we must look at the circumstances as they stood at the time.

Now, the first question is a question of principle. Was there anything in the relation of these parties and in the nature of the question which they had to settle, which precluded them or precluded the company from making a settlement at the time when it was made without assuring themselves that the pursuer had advice and assistance of a character which is not shewn to have been had by him? There was no relation of influence or of confidence between the parties, they were certainly at arm's length. It was simply the case of a man having a cause of action for damages in respect of personal injury against those with whom he had entered into the contract which always subsists between persons travelling by railway and the railway company as carriers, and so long as there was nothing in the circumstances known to the company, or in their conduct, to give them an undue advantage of which they improperly availed themselves, I cannot think that parties so at arm's length are disabled by law from settling without litigation, and without going through any preliminaries for the purpose of ascertaining that each party is sufficiently informed as to the injuries. I cannot think that there is anything in the law to prevent them from making such a settlement; and it is fair to remember that while on the one hand the railway company offers compensation, and may offer what may turn out to be too little, on the other hand the party injured not infrequently over-estimates his injury and asks a great deal more than he is fairly entitled to.

Well, then, we must look at the circumstances as they stood. There had been an accident of a peculiar kind, which in point of fact had inflicted no external injury. Whatever injury there might be latent in the case was either upon the nerves arising from the shock of the accident, or consisted in some internal effect upon the bodily system not at the time known to or discoverable by either party. In that respect it seems to me that the reports of Dr Watson are of importance. They shew that he had more than once visited the patient, and had discovered nothing more than that.

If he had told the company this was a case of a certain kind involving a permanent disability it may be that the company, having received that information, would have been acting in a manner not becoming them in keeping it back and taking advantage of that knowledge to obtain a settlement which under those circumstances might reasonably have been said to be too favourable to themselves. But there was nothing of that kind. It was a case as to which it was doubtful whether there was anything more than a temporary shock which would pass away—there was no external injury. As far as I can see there was no improper suppression of anything which Dr Watson had said. He had said that he had been unable to discover any external injury, although I do not think that that appears in the written report. That was told, and as far as I can see was quite truly told, to the sufferer. The sufferer was a man of business, for I must consider that a commercial traveller may be so described, and there is no suggestion that he was not a man of intelligence. He was living with his sister and her husband, the husband himself being in the employment of the railway company, and no motive is even suggested for his not giving such fair assistance as he could to his brother-in-law in the circumstances as they stood. He was informed by the railway company beforehand, in order that he might inform his brother-in-law (the sufferer) beforehand, of what it was that they proposed to offer. And more than that, at the very outset, the railway company had invited from the pursuer any demand which he might think fit to make, and he had preferred apparently to wait for what they might be pleased to offer.

Well, the parties met, and with that previous notice, and when he was in a state of mind which, according to his brother-in-law's evidence, appears to me totally to exclude the notion of inability to understand what he was about,—the pursuer deliberately took this money which was offered, £27, and signed the document which your Lordships have seen, which is short, and partly printed, leaving the necessary particulars to be filled up, which he did himself in, as appears to me, a very good handwriting, not at all indicative of any species of bodily disability at the time. For my part, I should say that whether he did or did not carefully read the document, it was impossible for him to have filled it up, and signed it as he did without seeing enough of it to understand it, and if he is to be trusted when he says that he did not read it, I can only say that I should conclude from that that he did not read it because he knew perfectly well what was in it without reading it.

Well, what is the document? It is a full discharge of all claims of this sort, and it is obvious that it is the object of such a payment, offered in such a manner, to get rid of the uncertainty and the expense, and the risks of litigation on the one side and on the other. The pursuer signs this document, and then brings this action a year, or more than a year, afterwards.

Now, of the points which have been insisted upon, the most important, as it seems to me, is the suggestion that the acceptance of the payment and the signature of the document were at the time qualified by an express reservation, which either ought to be taken as accepted by the company's agent, or, at all events, as shewing that the pursuer's mind did not go with the words of the document which he was signing. That being the most important matter now insisted upon, it seems to me, in the first place, to be very remarkable that there is no reference to this in the judgments of the Court below, and in the absence of that reference I hardly think that your Lordships ought to assume that the mind of the Court below did turn upon that point. Well, if not, what is there to maintain this judgment? But even taking that point without any prejudice from the absence of reference to it in the Court below, still it seems to me to be a point, which taken as it is, and having regard to such evidence as has been given upon it, makes it extremely important to see what the case was which was put upon the record, and of which case the parties were allowed to proceed to proof, because when the case came by the earlier interlocutor before the Inner-House, their Lordships remitted that part of the case "of consent" to the Lord Ordinary, "with instructions to allow parties a proof of their averments made on record."

Now, what are these averments? The first was that the receipt did "not discharge, and was not understood by the pursuer to discharge, his right to make any further claim against the defenders." Now, if there had been a reservation expressly and unequivocally made, so that it must have been understood on the other side, and one which was intended to make out that which seemed to be an absolute discharge in fact a qualified one, as if for payment on certain contingencies, or merely on account,—if it had taken place with that indication,—it must have been from first to last so understood by the pursuer, and it is to me perfectly inconceivable that if it had been so he could have pleaded his defence in the way he does, because no man in such a pleading, with his mind addressed to the point, is in the habit of stating his case greatly below that which he means to rely upon. But, as the pursuer states it, it seems to turn on only two propositions, one, that the effect of the instrument upon the face of it is not a discharge (as to which I need say nothing, because it is clearly an untenable point), and secondly, that the pursuer did not understand that it was a discharge. But if it was the pursuer only who did not understand that, and if nothing took place to make the document otherwise than that which it was upon its face towards the party paying the money, the point comes to nothing, and so the Lord Ordinary expressly held when he dealt with the issues which were in the first instance proposed.

What were the issues which the pursuer proposed? The first of them was "whether he was injured or not." I put that aside, as there is no question about it. Secondly, "whether when the pursuer signed the receipt he understood that he thereby discharged his claims against the defenders in full." But the Lord Ordinary said that that would not do, that it would be no defence, and if nothing more had been pleaded but that, the defence would have failed in point of relevancy. It is after the pursuer knows that this defence which he has pleaded is good for nothing that these statements are made in the evidence. Well, since three witnesses speak of having heard something to the effect that in a possible case the pursuer would come back upon the railway company, I should be very sorry to suppose that nothing of the kind was said, but the question is whether it was so said, either in point of intention on the part of the pursuer or in point of the meaning, which is conveyed to the mind of the other party, that it amounted to a reservation qualifying the written document. I cannot think that it was. I cannot think that he ever supposed that it was, because otherwise he would have pleaded in a different way from what he did; and that leads me to attribute a much greater weight upon that point to the statement made by Mr William Wood, who both in his statement and in his examination in chief, and still more emphatically in his cross-examination, says very positively that that did not happen in the sense now relied upon, because, though I agree with those who observe that three witnesses who remember a matter are generally more to be trusted than another who does not remember it, yet if it had taken place in the way necessary for the pursuer's argument, so as to convey unequivocally to Mr William Wood the idea that the written document did not express the true sense of the parties, then I think he would have been likely to remember it, and perhaps, as he himself thinks it very probable, he would not have paid the money. The conclusion which I draw from the evidence as a whole upon that point is that whatever was said it was not so said as to be on both sides intended and understood to be a qualification of the res gesta of the written and signed document. That it was not so understood by Mr William Wood, I am bound to believe from what he has himself said. That it was not so understood on the other side, I cannot but conclude from the manner in which the pleadings stand upon the point.

July 2, 1891. North British Railway Co. v. Wood.

Then upon the other points which are pleaded the next two pleas are doubtless those alone which caused the Court to send the case to proof at all. The defenders' representative assured the pursuer "that he was suffering only from a slight nervous shock and that he would be all right in a week or two." Well, with reference to that there is nothing upon the evidence whatever. The words in a part of the evidence which were referred to by the learned counsel for the respondent were only these,—he asked whether he had ever had a slight nervous shock before. That is not telling him that he was suffering only from a slight nervous shock, and still less that "he would be all right in a week or two." If that had been said it would no doubt have been very material indeed, because Dr Watson's opinion, such as it was, was known to the railway company; but there has been no attempt to prove it. Asking a man whether he has ever had a slight nervous shock is as remote from telling him that in point of fact he is suffering from a slight nervous shock and nothing more as anything can be, in the sense of a representation tending to influence action.

Then the third statement in the pleadings is "That shortly after the accident, and in consequence of it, the pursuer's mind became seriously affected." When we get that upon the evidence it appears thus, that he was in a state of excitement and alarm on the day of the accident when Dr Watson first saw him, and that that alarm was greatly mitigated on the next day; and so far from the state of his mind at the time when the receipt was signed and the money was paid appearing to have been such as to affect his competency to enter into the transaction, his own brother-in-law distinctly proves the reverse. For my part I can see nothing in the evidence of the sister or any other part of the evidence to suggest to me the least doubt that he did really understand what he was doing. If, therefore, we are to look to the averments on the record, it appears to me impossible to hold that any of them which are material have been proved; and what the evidence adds to the averments, I think looked at in the light of those averments, does not amount to that kind of qualification of an act done which ought to be regarded as defining it of the character which it would otherwise have had.

Therefore I humbly move your Lordships to reverse these interlocutors, and to assoilzie the defenders from the conclusions of the action.

LORD WATSON.—I am of the same opinion, and I have only to say that I concur in everything which has been said by the noble and learned Earl.

LORD BRAMWELL.—I am entirely of the same opinion, and I doubt very much whether I ought to say anything more when my noble and learned friend, who is better acquainted with this procedure than I can possibly pretend to be, has not said anything more, but as we are differing from the learned Judges of the Court of Session I should just like to say why I have come to the conclusion which I have. It is very true—I believe it is what plaintiffs trust to when they bring actions of this description—that people are sorry that they should have suffered and not been adequately compensated. That, of course, as the noble and learned Earl has said, is no reason why, if they have entered into a bargain which deprives them of the right to further compensation they should not be held to that bargain, and I feel disposed to hold them to it strictly, because if on the one hand one is sorry for them, on the other hand it is to my mind a most objectionable thing that they should be encouraged to wriggle (to quote an expression of an Irish Lord Justice) out of an agreement which they have entered into, and to be tempted to make untrue statements, or if not absolutely untrue, at all events exaggerated and coloured statements, as I have not the slightest doubt has been done here.

Now, I should just like to say one or two words upon the reasons for which I have come to this conclusion. In the first place, as to the facts, I really do think that if ever there was an unreasonable complaint of the conduct of railway people it is in this case. Instead of going to this man privily, as it were, due notice is given to him by his own brother-in-law that a person will come with a named sum of money on the next day. He has time to consider, therefore, whether he will take it or not. When on the next day that person comes, the money is given to him in the presence of his sister and of his brother-in-law, and he signs this receipt. Well, now, can anyone pretend for a moment that this man (I forget what his age is, but he is not very young)—he is a middle-aged man, I think, and a business man, a commercial traveller—did not perfectly know what it was that he was signing, and the effect of it? If he did not read it he ought to take the consequences, but I think the answer has already been given. If he did not read it, it was because he did not want to read it, for he knew what was in it. Under these circumstances, to charge the railway company with anything like unfairness seems to be really preposterous.

I made a remark in the course of the argument which I should like to repeat. Three people say that something was said about the pursuer's possibly coming upon the railway company again. A witness on the other side, young Mr Wood, says that he does not believe that was said. I think there is some hesitation or ambiguity in his evidence about it. I believe that at one time he says he does not recollect, and at another time he says it was not said. But he gives a very good reason for not believing that it was said, and that is that he would not have paid the money unless it had been conveyed to his mind that it was taken in full satisfaction.

I am reluctant to think that the three people who say that something of that sort was said are telling a wilful untruth about the matter, and I think it is likely, as has been suggested by the noble and learned Earl, that something to this effect might have been said,—"Well, I shall make another application to you if I turn out to be very bad." I think it is perfectly possible that that was said, but so said as not to convey to the mind of the man who was paying the money that it was not taken as it was paid in full satisfaction. Like the noble and learned Earl on the woolsack, I cannot help relying in support of that very much upon the statement which the pursuer makes in his answer to the case of the defenders. He does not put it forward that he qualified his acceptance of this money by saying,—"Mind I do not take it in satisfaction, for if things turn out to be worse I shall make a further claim upon you." I do not want to go over this—it has been commented upon by the noble and learned Earl. It is clear to my mind that he did not suggest such a thing as that, and I should say, dealing with this as an English lawyer, these answers 1, 2, and 3 would be bad on general demurrer. There was no question raised, unless indeed it was perhaps you may say something like this, that "the defenders' representative assured the pursuer that he was suffering from a slight nervous shock." Whether, if he had so assured the pursuer, it would have made any difference I do not know; I should think it ought not to have done so.

It appears to me therefore upon the substance of the matter that there really never was a plainer case than this present one; that the pursuer has no good cause of action. But the oddity of the thing to my mind is, that the judgment was pronounced upon a question which was not properly before the learned Judges, as well as I can understand, and not upon the real question. I look at Lord Young's judgment. He says,—"The parties very wisely agreed that the case should be determined by the Lord Ordinary without a jury. We now have before us the evidence taken before the Lord Ordinary, and the judgment pronounced upon it. As he has thought £500 a proper sum to award, I am not prepared to hold that the pursuer is barred by accepting £27. The question we have to determine is, whether we should interfere with that judgment." There does not seem, in the judgments of the learned Judges, to have been any dealing with the question which is really the question,—a question raised explicitly by the defenders on the pleadings, that all future actions were barred by that which had taken place between the parties. That is a very singular thing.

I should just like to say one word more, although I suppose it will be obiter. If, when the document was signed, the pursuer had made it intelligible to young Mr Wood that he was not taking the money, as the paper said, "in full satisfaction and discharge of all claims," I am inclined to think that if he could have proved that in point of fact he would have been at liberty to maintain this action, and I do not see anything in the cases which were cited and relied on which goes further than that. I cannot suppose that a man might not sign a document, and at the same time give to the person to whom he had handed that document, and with whom he was dealing, to understand, "Mind, I do not mean what I say." I do not mean to say that such things ought to be encouraged, and I do not mean to say that I should believe a statement of that kind very readily, if such a case came before me. But, as I have said already, I do not think that anything of that sort took place here. I think that if anything was said, the principle of Croft v. Lumley (1857, 6 Clark's H. of L. Cases, 672) would apply, that it must be taken that the man paying was paying according to the terms upon which he said he was paying, and that he was not informed that he must not understand that.

I really do think, my Lords, that this is about as plain a case as ever was, and as to any complaint against the conduct of the railway company, and of the Woods who acted for the company, it not only seems to be utterly unfounded, but it does seem to me that they behaved in the very fairest way.

Bankruptcy—Nobile officium—Discharge of both trustee and bankrupt—Appointment of new trustee—Abandonment of claim.—Certain creditors upon a sequestrated estate on which both the trustee and the bankrupt had been discharged, the latter without composition, presented a petition for a remit to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills to appoint a meeting of creditors for the election of a new trustee, averring that there were funds belonging to the sequestrated estate which had not been recovered, and that the petitioners had not been paid their debts in full. It was objected by the bankrupt that all claim to these funds had been abandoned by the trustee. Held (aff. judgment of First Division), that the petition fell to be granted.

EARL OF SELBORNE.—This appears to be an extremely clear case, so far as the question of the competency of the Court of Session was concerned, to make an order in a sequestration for the appointment of a new trustee. For the last thirty years there has been such a practice in the case of funds which have not been got in or distributed at the time of the discharge of the trustee in bankruptcy. No doubt a practice which has continued so long may be wrong, but it is needless to say the presumption is the other way. The case rests upon this proposition, that when a trustee has been discharged, all funds not at that time distributed vest by law in the bankrupt for his own benefit, although the creditors have not been paid 20s. in the pound, or interest on their debts; and that at all events, if that is not the necessary construction of the clause itself, the fact of there being no provision made in the statute as to the machinery by which a new trustee is to be brought into existence in that case is enough to prevent anyone but the bankrupt from claiming and getting the benefit of those funds. I confess I had great difficulty in following that argument, having regard to the express provisions of the Act, as well as for the general purpose for which it was passed. The general purpose is to enable a debtor who cannot pay his way to get his discharge upon the footing of giving up the whole of his property for the benefit of the creditors. For the present purpose (subject, of course, to any contest which may be raised elsewhere), it must be assumed upon the facts which we know that the fund in question was, at and before the time of the bankrupt's discharge, a part of his distributable estate under this sequestration. Supposing it was so, what is there to take away from the creditors the right to have it applied for their benefit? The 102d section, the vesting clause, in the fullest and strongest terms vests, for the purpose of distribution, in the trustee, "for behoof of the creditors, absolutely and irredeemably," "all right, title, and interest" in every part of the property of the debtor. Another clause, one of the dividend clauses, the 132d, after express provision for the first and the second dividends, goes on to say that similar divisions are to be made from time to time "until the whole funds of the bankrupt shall be divided." And the very clause which is relied upon, the 152d, provides for steps to be taken by the trustee in order to obtain his discharge "after a final division of the funds." From the beginning to the end of the Act there is nothing to cut down the right given to the creditors, in accordance with the general purposes of the Act, to have all the funds which vested in the trustee divided among them.

But it is argued that, because in point of fact, in such a case as this, where there has not been a final division of the funds, a trustee, upon the erroneous supposition that there were no more funds to be divided, has taken the steps provided for by the 152d section, and has got a discharge, therefore it is impossible to distribute the funds which ought to be distributed for the benefit of the creditors, and that they revert to the bankrupt. I should have said that that was a very difficult proposition seriously to maintain, even if there had been nothing in the Act providing for the circumstances under which something is to revert to the bankrupt. But the 155th section expressly says that "any surplus of the bankrupt's estate and effects that may remain after payment of his debts, with interest, and the charges of recovering and distributing the estate, shall be paid to the bankrupt." And there is another section mentioned by one of your Lordships, dealing with a case which has not happened here, which also provides for something which is to go to the bankrupt.

Well, then, what is the question? It is contended that, when, upon the face of all the clauses in the Act which determine and provide for the rights of the parties, it is clear that this fund is not to go to the bankrupt, but is to go to his creditors; yet, because a trustee has been discharged and the case does not fall under the clause which provides for death, resignation, or removal, and the necessity for appointing a new trustee had not been discovered till the existence of this distributable fund was discovered, therefore you cannot now by any means whatever appoint a new trustee, because there is no express provision for it in the statute. I must say for my own part I look upon the appointment of a new trustee for this purpose as nothing more than machinery for giving effect to the rights given by the Act. It seems to me that the Court has under the Act the power of providing that machinery for giving effect to those rights; and the practice of the Court of Session has been in accordance with that view of the case.

June 16, 1891.

Whyte v. Northern Heritable Securities Investment Co.

I think it would be very difficult to imagine a clearer case than this is; and, with regard to the special circumstances, the facts which were stated, as operating by way of an equitable estoppel in some way or another to prevent the assertion of the right of the creditors, seem to me not to raise any intelligible shadow of any equity whatever. Therefore, I have to move your Lordships that this appeal be dismissed, and, the appellant being a pauper, that it be dismissed in the way usual in pauper cases, without costs.

LORD WATSON.—I am of the same opinion. The provisions of the Bankruptcy Act of 1856 strip the bankrupt of the whole property of every description which is vested in him at the date of the sequestration, and also of all property that may come to him during the subsistence of the sequestration prior to his own discharge. According to my view of the statute, he can only get back the property which has been taken from him absolutely and irredeemably by the force of the statute in one of three ways—either, first, by his discharge upon payment of a composition to his creditors; secondly, by receiving a part of it as surplus after satisfying their claims to the extent of twenty shillings in the pound; or, in the third place, by a transaction with the trustee and creditors of the bankrupt's estate. The creditors may deal with him as to the footing upon which they give back part of the property; they may abandon it. It is not necessary, in my view, that in every case there should be a retrocession. The acts of the trustee and creditors in relation to it may be such as to indicate that the bankrupt is, according to their desire, to be deemed to be in future the master or the owner of the property, and that they have abandoned and rejected it.

Now, as to the period when a sequestration comes to an end, the able argument of Mr Haldane rested mainly upon this: that the sequestration in this case had absolutely come to a close in terms of the statute, and accordingly that the exercise of their prætorial power by the First Division of the Court of Session was in reality legislation; that they had revived a process which by the statute was at an end. I am quite unable to take that view of the provisions of the Act. I think the final close of the sequestration contemplated by the statute was the discharge of the trustee after the final distribution—after the whole of the funds vested in him by force of the statute had been applied to their proper purpose, namely, payment of the debts ranked in the sequestration. When I speak of final distribution, I mean distribution of what were in fact the last funds available for the purpose.

Now, in this case there was no doubt a discharge of the trustee upon the footing that the available funds had been distributed. That was the footing upon which the discharge of the trustee proceeded, so far as I can see. But it proves to have been in face of the fact that there were funds extant at that date which were available, and might have been made available by the trustee for division among the creditors. Now, it appears to me that the discharge of a trustee upon that footing before final distribution, either in ignorance or by inadvertence, cannot possibly alter the provisions of the Act, and that by force of the Act the sequestration notwithstanding subsists for behoof of the creditors. When a trustee has been discharged upon that footing erroneously, I do not doubt (indeed, I think it is implied in the statute, as my noble and learned friend on the woolsack has said) that the Court has power to furnish the machinery necessary for working the sequestration to its close—necessary for getting in the whole assets available for payment of the creditors and distributing those assets among them, and I have only to add, that in my opinion the parties who made this application to the Court below were quite right in appealing to the nobile officium of the Inner-House, because I do not find in the statute any precise delegation of the authority required for such a purpose either to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills or to the Sheriff.

Upon the second part of the case I have nothing to add.

Curator Bonis—Insanity—Insane delusion—Opposition of alleged incapax—Necessity for cognition or judicial inquiry.—When a petition for the appointment of a curator bonis to a person alleged to be incapable of managing his own affairs is opposed by him, he is not entitled to demand cognition or a formal judicial inquiry at which witnesses shall be examined on oath, with an opportunity for cross-examination, before the appointment is made, but the Court is entitled to adopt what course it considers best to obtain the information necessary, and, if it sees fit, to proceed on the reports of medical men.

The wife of a man who was detained in a lunatic asylum presented a petition for the appointment of a curator bonis to her husband. He opposed the petition, maintaining that he could not be superseded in the management of his affairs except under cognition upon a brieve from Chancery. He did not dispute the propriety of his being in the asylum, but stated that such delusions as he might labour under in no way interfered with his business capacity. The First Division, on a consideration of medical reports obtained by the petitioner, by the respondent, and by the Court, granted the petition.

The respondent appealed.

LORD HERSCHELL.—This is an appeal from a judgment of the First Division of the Court of Session affirming an appointment made by the Lord Ordinary of a curator bonis in the case of the appellant, who at that time was under detention in an asylum as a person of unsound mind. He was so detained in conformity with the law, by reason of the certificates which were given by two medical men with reference to his mental condition. He being thus under confinement as a person of unsound mind, an application was made by his wife for the appointment by the Court of a curator bonis. The appellant opposed any such appointment being made, and those who were acting for him, after putting before the Court the certificates which had been given by various medical gentlemen, to whom I will refer in a moment, "submitted his case to the consideration of the Court" and prayed that "after making such further inquiry as shall appear to the Court to be necessary or desirable in the circumstances, the Court, in the event of considering it necessary that a curator bonis should be appointed to the respondent, may be pleased to appoint such person as the Court in its wisdom may select." And then objection is taken to the appointment of the person whose name had been suggested by the petitioner.

C B v. A B.

Now, it appears that on the 20th of May of last year, the appellant, having been confined in the lunatic asylum in the month of April, was examined by two medical men, Dr Stewart and Dr Watson, and that they gave this certificate—"While we should not recommend it as safe that" the appellant "should be relieved from a restraint which has acted most beneficially in favouring recovery, and is, we believe, fitted to secure the best prospect of ultimate restoration to health, we feel it impossible at the present moment, from facts observed by ourselves, to grant a certificate for the appointment of a curator bonis. What we do recommend is delay; and we beg to advise that after the lapse of a month or six weeks a further examination of the appellant should be held for the purpose of deciding upon the necessity of appointing a curator."

A few days after that, a little more than a week, the appellant was examined by two other medical men, Dr Balfour and Dr Littlejohn—the one on the 28th of May, and the other on the 31st. On the 28th of May Dr Balfour certified that he had "seen and examined" the appellant, and was "of opinion that he is of unsound mind and incapable of managing his own affairs or of directing their management." And on the 31st of May a similar certificate was given by Dr Littlejohn.

If the matter had rested only on those certificates it might have been open to some possible question, regarded from a medical point of view, whether the appellant was incapable of managing his own affairs, by reason of the terms of the certificates given in the first instance by Dr Stewart and Dr Watson. But naturally enough those who were acting for the appellant as his law-agents secured the services of two medical gentlemen in whom the appellant had confidence (I rather think one of them was named by himself), namely, Dr Clouston and Dr Byrom Bramwell. They, on behalf of the appellant, made an examination of his condition with a view to expressing their opinion as to whether he was or was not capable of managing his affairs, and they came to the conclusion which is thus expressed—"We found him coherent and acute in regard to business matters. His memory seemed to be good with regard to everything except the events of the morning of the 3d of April last; but taking into account the whole of the facts elicited at our prolonged examination of his mental condition, we feel unable to give a certificate that he is yet fit to manage his affairs or to give directions for their management."

Now, it appears to me that anything more calculated to produce in the mind of anyone the conviction that this gentleman was incapable of managing his affairs it is impossible to conceive. That two medical men visiting him at the instance of his law-agents, and at his own instance, with the view of, if possible (for, of course, they would understand that to be the object of their visit), certifying that he was capable of managing his own affairs, should feel themselves unable to give such a certificate, shews that the conclusion arrived at by those who had examined him on behalf of the petitioner was not a conclusion which resulted merely from bias or prejudice in their minds, or from any want of skill, but was a conclusion which those selected by himself or his advisers felt themselves unable to controvert.

The matter does not rest there, because the appellant was also examined by three other medical men at his own instance or the instance of his advisers. Dr Howden and Dr Ferguson saw him in the month of November 1890. I need not trouble your Lordships with the detail of the statement which they make, which is of considerable length, but in that statement they detail a conversation which they had had with him, which indicated that he was under the belief that for many years those about him had been attempting to poison him with arsenic. "He stated that he had frequently seen a suspicious white powder in the doses of Epsom salts he was in the habit of taking, that he tasted arsenic in his tea, that he had overheard some remarks about the drug in his house, and that he believed someone was procuring it from a firm who advertised neuralgic pills. As proof of the last supposition he had found the cover of a journal in which the pills in question were advertised. Inside the cover there were two pieces of red silk. When asked to explain what connection the silk had with the arsenic" (a very natural question, of course, for one medical man to put to another medical man) "he said he believed that the pieces of silk had contained arsenic, and that he regarded them as important links in the chain of suspicion. When asked to name the person whom he suspected of obtaining the poison he declined to do so." The conclusion which these gentlemen state is, that he was "of unsound mind, that if at large he might be dangerous to the persons who are the object of his suspicions, and that the nature of his delusions unfits him to treat with fairness the members of his own family and household, and renders him liable to be biased in a similar manner against others; (third) that, nevertheless, he is capable of clearly appreciating his worldly interests in many ways; (fourth) that if management of his affairs includes a just and natural regard to the interests of his family, we do not consider he is worthy of being entrusted with their management; but (fifth) that we are not prepared to say that his mental condition, as ascertained by us, incapacitates him from administering his affairs in other respects"—which obviously means, that he is, in their opinion, suffering from insane delusions which might affect the disposal by him of his property, and might lead him to employ it in a manner in which he would not employ it if he were sane; that is to say, he might dissipate it upon objects on which if he were sane he would not desire to spend it.

No. 7.

C B v. A B.

On the 7th of November 1890 he was examined by Dr Yellowlees, who had an interview with him lasting over two and a-half hours, and he says,—"I believe that" the appellant "is conversant with his business affairs and investments, and that he could give directions concerning them, but such directions would be influenced or swayed or determined by the presence of delusions as to relatives or others conspiring against him and desiring to injure him, and might be influenced by insane ideas as to spiritualism and its devotees, supposing" the appellant "to entertain such delusions and ideas."

Now, those were the opinions which were before the Court. It appears to me that if the Lord Ordinary was justified in being guided by the expression of medical opinion, it is difficult to conceive a stronger case justifying the conclusion that it was proper not to leave the appellant in the management of his own affairs, but to appoint, during the period for which his insanity should continue, a curator bonis. When the matter came before the Lord Ordinary, notwithstanding these medical opinions he determined not to act upon them alone. The later opinions which I have read were, I think, given after the date of the Lord Ordinary's judgment; they were before the Inner-House but not before the Lord Ordinary. But the Lord Ordinary, not being satisfied to act upon the medical opinions which were before him, remitted the case to Sir Arthur Mitchell, who, I believe (it is so stated by Lord M'Laren) fills the office of Chief Commissioner in Lunacy, to report to him upon the subject. About the competency and the high character of Sir Arthur Mitchell there cannot be a question. Sir Arthur Mitchell accordingly reported to the Lord Ordinary that, in his opinion, the present appellant was "of unsound mind," and that in consequence of this "he was incapable of managing or of giving directions for the management of his affairs." Sir Arthur Mitchell states that he "arrived at this opinion without hesitation or difficulty." I understand that to mean that in his opinion his unsoundness of mind was of such a character that he was incapable of managing or giving directions for the management of his affairs. The Lord Ordinary was not left merely to a consideration of the terms of that written opinion, because he had a personal interview with Sir Arthur Mitchell, and learned from Sir Arthur Mitchell that in his opinion the appellant was "subject to delusions related to what is known as spiritualism, of such a nature as to render him quite an unsafe guardian of his own property, and which might render him liable to be very readily imposed on by designing people who were aware of his weakness." The Lord Ordinary adds,—"He entertains besides, Sir Arthur informs me, feelings of mistrust towards his family which cannot be altogether disregarded."

Now, that was the information which the Court possessed. If it was open to the Lord Ordinary and the Inner-House to exercise their discretion, relying upon the information afforded by these medical opinions and the report of Sir Arthur Mitchell on the remit to him, I do not think it can be doubted for a moment that the conclusion at which they arrived in their discretion cannot possibly be questioned—no ground for questioning it has been made out. There was really no conflict of opinion in this case between the medical men who were consulted. Those consulted on behalf of the appellant were manifestly as fully persuaded as those consulted by the petitioner that it was a case in which it was not expedient that he should be left to manage his affairs.

But then it was argued on behalf of the appellant, first of all, that there was an absolute right in such a case as this, where the appointment of a curator was opposed, to have a cognition and an investigation by a jury, and that only after a finding by a jury could he be deprived of the management of his affairs. I think it is impossible so to maintain after the judgment of this House in the case of Bryce v. Graham, 1828, 3 W. & S. 323. That was a case where a curator of an admittedly insane person had been appointed, and it was alleged that he was at that time convalescent, and sought on that ground to get rid of the curator. The Court there remitted to the Sheriff-depute to make certain inquiries. I shall have occasion to deal with the terms of that remit presently—it is unnecessary to go into them for the moment; but notwithstanding that inquiry by the Sheriff, it had been contended before your Lordship's House that there was an absolute right to a cognition and to the verdict of a jury upon the question then at issue. Lord Eldon, influenced by the English practice, appears at first to have been disposed to entertain that view, but after learning what had been the practice of the Court of Session, he thus expressed himself,—"When this cause was heard, it was thought necessary by this House to desire the Court of Session to consider whether they could take this course according to their law, or whether there was not a necessity for a cognition to issue in order to have the finding of a jury on the case. We have since received the answer to that question so propounded by your Lordships, and that is, that the Court have been in the habit of proceeding in this course for a very long period of years, for so long a period that I do not think it is proper to advise your Lordships to hold that this is not a legal proceeding on their part." Now, that I take to be an absolutely unequivocal decision of this House that there is no such right to a cognition as has been contended for here, and that the Court can without any such cognition deal with the question of the appointment of a curator bonis in the case of a lunatic.

But then it was contended on behalf of the appellant that even if there be not the absolute right to a cognition contended for, yet the Court can only appoint a curator after a judicial inquiry, that is to say, after evidence has been taken in the ordinary way upon oath with the opportunity of cross-examination by the opposing party—I do not mean to say that it was contended that this must be done in every case. It was admitted that in many cases a curator was appointed without such an inquiry, but the argument was, that in every opposed case, where the alleged lunatic was objecting to the appointment of a curator, the appointment of a curator could only be made after a judicial inquiry. Some reliance was placed by the learned counsel, for the purpose of supporting that argument, upon the course taken in the case of Bryce v. Graham, to which I have just alluded. It is quite true that in that case the Court remitted to the Sheriff-depute "to inquire concerning the condition of intellect and state of faculties of the petitioner James Bryce, and his abilities to manage and conduct his own affairs," and they authorised and directed the Sheriff "to proceed to the inquiry by personal visitation of and intercourse with the said James Bryce at various times, and without previous warning or concert, as also by examination upon oath of such witnesses suggested by either party who had sufficient cause of knowledge respecting the premises, and likewise by the opinion of medical persons named by the Sheriff to visit him"; and they then ordained the Sheriff "to report his opinion on the said matters to the said Lords." But, as I understand, such a remit to the Sheriff was a course taken by the Court only for the purpose of informing their own minds and enabling them to decide, after receiving that report, what was in their judgment the proper course to be pursued. It was not a remit to the Sheriff to try the case. Whatever conclusion had been arrived at by the Sheriff, as I understand, it would have been open to the Court to disregard it, and notwithstanding the opinion of the Sheriff that a curator ought or ought not to be appointed, the Court might have come to the very opposite conclusion. It was only for the purpose of assisting them to form a judgment that the remit was made. Now, I do not understand that remit to have been made in a form which can be regarded as a precedent universally to be followed and applicable to every kind of case. In that particular case it was considered by the Court, having regard to circumstances, to be a proper form of remit, but I do not consider it either to have decided that in every case a remit to the Sheriff was necessary, or that if there were such a remit that was the proper form.

I think the contrary is proved by the authorities. In the case of Gordon v. Gunn, 11 S. 235, which was also a question as to the appointment of a curator bonis, and where there was a remit to the Sheriff, the remit was in these terms —"To inquire concerning the condition of intellect and state of the faculties of Mr John Gordon, of Swiney, and his abilities to manage and conduct his own affairs, and with power to examine medical men and witnesses on the subject, and to report." Now, the power is no doubt given to examine witnesses as well as to examine the alleged lunatic himself, and to examine medical men, but no obligation is imposed on the Sheriff, nor is any direction given, as I understand, to the Sheriff to do so, as was given in the case of Bryce v. Graham, where he was not only empowered but was in terms directed to do so. Here all I can find is that power was given to him to examine medical men and other witnesses on the subject.

No. 7.

June 25, 1891.
C. B v. A B.

The case does not stop there, because in Dewar v. Dewar, 12 S. 315, which is a later case, the Court made a remit to the Sheriff-substitute "to inquire as to the facts and circumstances alleged by the parties, and report whether in his opinion it is necessary or expedient for the protection of the respondent to appoint a judicial factor or factors or curator or curators bonis." The Sheriff-substitute, in returning his report, stated that he had "personally visited the respondent, and made due inquiry otherwise." I need not trouble your Lordships with the terms of that report. It is manifest that in that case the appointment neither directed him to examine witnesses, nor did he take proof as upon a judicial inquiry, but he made his report to the Court, and then the Court were in a position to act after receiving the information which he supplied to them. Now, that case seems to me to be a distinct authority against the proposition contended for by the learned counsel for the appellant, because it is obvious that if in every case where there is opposition there is the right to a judicial inquiry either by the Court itself or by a remit to the Sheriff, the Court neglected its duty in that case by not making the judicial inquiry which it is contended must in all cases be made.

Therefore I confess it appears to me that so far as authority goes, there is no authority for the proposition that in every case the Court is bound to make a judicial inquiry, or to remit the case to the Sheriff in order that he may do so. And it seems to me that there is authority for the course being taken which was taken in the present case, for in Forsyth v. Forsyth, 24 D. 1435, the Court made a remit to two men of skill in order to have the advantage of their opinion upon the subject. In the present case a remit was made by the Lord Ordinary to Sir Arthur Mitchell, a man, as I have said, highly competent to fulfil such a function, and the Court had the advantage of his report before arriving at any conclusion. Therefore there appears to me to be no authority justifying the assertion that the Court can only act by taking proof itself or having proof taken before the Sheriff. There is authority for the proposition that the Court may act, and has been in the habit of acting, upon a remit to a medical man or medical men of skill to assist it in forming its conclusion. But all these authorities together leave without any doubt the impression upon my mind that in every one of these cases it is for the Court to form its own conclusion, and it is for the Court to determine in its discretion what assistance it will obtain towards forming that conclusion. That assistance has been of a different character in different cases, but whatever its character has been, whether in the way of proof before the Sheriff or not, it appears to me only to have been such assistance as the Court thought right to acquire in order to enable it to come to a conclusion as to how the discretion reposed in it ought to be exercised.

If that be so, I think it disposes of the whole of the contentions which have been put before your Lordships on behalf of the appellant, and it shews the course taken in this case to have been correct. I therefore move your Lordships to affirm this judgment, and to dismiss the appeal.

LORD WATSON.—I cannot say that I have anything to add to the statement of this case which has been made by my noble and learned friend. To anyone conversant with the law and practice of Scotland, this must, in my opinion, appear to be a most groundless appeal. I think there can be no doubt whatever, in the first place, that the Court of Session had jurisdiction to entertain the application made to it; in the second place, that notwithstanding the appearance of the present appellant to oppose its prayer being granted, it was a matter entirely within the discretion of the Court to determine what inquiry was necessary for the purpose of enlightening them as to the capacity or incapacity of the appellant to manage his own affairs at the time; and in the third place, I think it equally clear that the certificates of the medical men which were produced were quite sufficient to justify the Court in taking the course which they did take, and making the appointment without further inquiry.

M'Inroy v. Duke of Athole.

DUKE OF ATHOLE, Respondent (Complainer).—D.-F. Balfour, Q.C.—Murray.

Servitude—Road—Constitution—Occasional use as access to shooting ground only.—A mountain path formed a convenient short cut from one part of an estate to another through a projecting tongue of an adjoining property, and from 1821 it was used by the proprietors of the estate as the means of going from the one part of the estate to the other when deerstalking in autumn, but it was used by them for no other purpose and at no other time, and between 1846 and 1878 they hardly used it at all. It was not proved that this use of the path had come to the knowledge of the proprietor of the adjoining estate except on two occasions, in 1857 and 1882, and on both occasions it was challenged by him. In 1888 he brought a note of suspension and interdict against the future use of the path by the respondent. Held (aff. judgment of Second Division) that the use of the path proved was not sufficient to shew that it was in the assertion of a right, and therefore that the respondent had failed to instruct the existence of a servitude right of way over the path in question.

LORD WATSON.—The Cromalton Pass is a natural hollow about 1000 yards in length between two mountains forming part of Ben-y-Glo range. It runs nearly due east and west, and the Cromalton Burn, which has its source to the north, flows along the bottom of the pass for more than half its length on the western side, and then enters the estate of Lude belonging to the appellants. The pass and the land on either side of it are the property of the respondent. Carnlia, one of the mountains enclosing it, rises on the south to the height of 3193 feet above sea-level, but only the upper part, which apparently comprises about one-third of its altitude, belongs to the respondent. The lower two-thirds are included in the estate of Lude, which surrounds Carnlia on the east, south, and west, and comes up to both ends of the pass. The mountain range to the north of the pass is the property of the respondent.

On the north side of the pass there is a track or path continuing all the way through it, which forms the subject of the present controversy. Starting from the west the track runs along the hill face a considerable distance above the Cromalton

Burn, which it eventually crosses, and is then continued along the hillside until it reaches the lands of Lude on the east. In this action the appellants asserted their right to use the track, on the ground that it formed part of an old public road leading from Glen Tilt in the north-west to Glenferrate and Kirkmichael in the south-east, and alternatively that they had acquired by prescriptive use a predial servitude of way for themselves, their tenants, servants, and others occupying the lands of Lude.

The appellants were allowed a proof of both alternatives, but they appear to have abandoned at a very early stage their claim for a public right of way. The user upon which they relied in the Court below as sufficient to constitute a servitude was by the family of Lude, their game-tenants, and gamekeepers, for sporting purposes, and by shepherds on their farms of Monzie and Glenloch, which are on opposite sides of Carnlia.

The Lord Ordinary (Kinnear) and all the learned Judges of the Second Division were of opinion that the appellants have failed to shew that there was any user by shepherds as in the assertion of a right. The Lord Ordinary being of opinion that the track had been used as of right during the prescriptive period for sporting purposes, sustained the alternative claim of the appellants as made by them on record. In the Inner-House his interlocutor was reversed, and the respondent obtained interdict as craved. In the argument addressed to this House on behalf of the appellants their claim was limited to a servitude of way for purposes connected with sport.

I think it right to say that I entirely concur in the observations which were made by the late Lord Lee upon the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary. Assuming that the appellants had in the open assertion of a right persistently used the track for the purpose of shooting or watching game, I do not think they could thereby acquire the right to free passage for every man, woman, and child on the estate of Lude, for any purpose whatever. I cannot conceive how a general servitude of way could arise in a case like the present, where it is clear that the use had by Lude shepherds during the prescriptive period was by permission and not as of right.

As for the track in dispute, the evidence satisfies me that it is not part of a continuous way made by or for human use, but that it owes its formation to deer and sheep, although it has been occasionally used by men when it suited their convenience. The only witness who suggests the contrary is Mr Young, who is under the impression that deer "rather avoid paths," but he admits that he "cannot speak about deer." There are no fences of any kind in the locality, which is on the outskirts of the great deer forest of Athole, and it appears that at certain seasons the deer which are bred in the forest descend below the pass in search of food. The season for shooting stags commences in the beginning of August, and ends before the middle of October, and during that period some deer are to be found in the vicinity of the pass. But the chief exodus from the forest is during the late autumn or winter months, when stags are out of season, and only the hinds are fit objects for a sportsman's rifle. The respondent has a few sheep upon that part of the forest upon which the sheep from Lude ground are constantly straying and being driven back. These facts sufficiently account for the numerous short tracks at the west end of the pass, which were erroneously supposed by Mr Young to be human footpaths.

The evidence of the appellants with reference to the use of the track for shooting purposes connected with the estate of Lude covers the whole period from the year 1821 until 1887, when the challenge was given which led to the institution of the present action. But from 1821 the proprietor of Lude asserted right to the ownership of the whole of the upper part of Carnlia down to the centre of the pass, and he shot over that part of the pass which he claimed until the respondent's right to these subjects was established by a decree of the Court of Session in 1841. During the period preceding 1841 Lude sportsmen were in the occasional habit of using the pass for the purpose of getting from their ground on the east side of Carnlia to their ground on the west, and vice versa; but whilst the evidence shews that on some of these occasions they shot over that part of the pass which they then claimed, there is neither probability nor proof that they either used or claimed the right to use the track now in dispute.

The case of the appellants must therefore depend upon their evidence of continuous and uninterrupted possession of the right which they now claim during the period of forty-six years following 1841. It is unnecessary to enter into the details of that evidence. It comes to this, that at certain seasons in each year the proprietors of Lude and their friends or game-tenants, in the course of their sport on the upper moors of Lude, used to go to their ground on the other side of Carnlia, which they did by means of the track, and also that their keepers sometimes used the track in going their rounds. It appears to have been rarely used by sportsmen in pursuit of game, but when there were no deer on the west face of Carnlia, stalkers found the track to be a convenient means of getting to the east face instead of going round the south end of the hill. The Lude ground is not in the strictest sense of the term a forest, and deerstalking upon it was chiefly confined to the hinds, which descend from the higher grounds and frequent the sides of Carnlia during the winter months. Even at that season the use of the track was not regular but occasional.

I do not find it necessary to consider, for the purposes of this appeal, the point discussed by some of the learned Judges of the Inner-House touching the amount of tolerance which ought to be implied on the part of a proprietor who sees a party of sportsmen taking a short cut across his land in order to reach another part of their ground. That must depend upon the circumstances of each case. If the respondent and his predecessor had been aware of the use made of the track by the Lude sportsmen at certain seasons in each of forty-six consecutive years, I should have had great difficulty in coming to the conclusion that such user was merely tolerated. But it appears to me that the facts of this case absolutely exclude the idea of tolerance. The only inference which I can draw from the proof is, that had the respondent or his predecessor known of that use they would immediately have done their best to put a stop to it.

I do not doubt that, in order to found a prescriptive right of servitude according to Scots law, acts of possession must be overt, in the sense that they must in themselves be of such a character or be done in such circumstances as to indicate unequivocally to the proprietor of the servient tenement the fact that a right is asserted, and the nature of the right. The proprietor who seeks to establish the right cannot, in my opinion, avail himself of any acts of possession in alieno solo, unless he is able to shew that they either were known, or ought to have been known, to its owner or to the persons to whom he intrusted the charge of his property.

In many—indeed in most—cases where a servitude of way is claimed, the natural and necessary inference arising from its local situation is that the user must have been known to the owner of the solum or to those whose duty it was to give him information. But that is an inference which it would be very unsafe to derive from the mere fact of the occasional user of an isolated deer tract, in a region remote from public observation, which is only visited at rare intervals by a few sportsmen, foresters, or shepherds.

With three exceptions, upon which great stress was laid in the argument addressed to us by the junior counsel for the appellants, not one of the numerous witnesses examined for them was able to say that a Lude sportsman or a Lude keeper was ever in the course of these forty-six years seen upon the track either by the respondent's servants, by the shepherds on the adjoining lands, or by any other person. The exceptions were these:—Angus Cameron, who has been head keeper at Lude since 1871, says that in 1872 or 1873, when he was going through the pass with Mr James M'Inroy, a son of the late proprietor, they met one of the Duke's foresters, who did not find fault with them. He does not say at what season, or that they were either grouse-shooting or deerstalking, so that taken by itself the incident is immaterial. The witness Gordon, who was examined on interrogatories in Canada, says that he never met the Duke's foresters in the pass itself, but that they were in the neighbourhood when he went through it with his father, then head keeper at Lude. But it is obvious that his statement refers to the period antecedent to 1841, because he states his understanding to have been "that the property on both sides of it (that is, the pass) belonged to Mr M'Inroy." The third exception is the witness William Carrick, who was an under keeper at Lude for three years between 1868 and 1871. He certainly does state in his examination-in-chief that when going through the pass he met the respondent's foresters on several occasions. But on cross-examination he explains that "the only time that I met any of the keepers right in the pass was when I was with them shooting foxes."

The appellants' own evidence points strongly to the inference that their use of the track was made in such circumstances that it was not likely to come, and in point of fact never came, to the knowledge of the respondent or his predecessors. But the matter does not rest there. A large and concurrent amount of testimony has been adduced by the respondent which shews that the appellants' user was unseen by and unknown to the proprietors of the Athole forest and their shepherds and foresters, and that testimony is not confined to servants upon the Athole estate. Amongst others, David Guild, who was the appellants' tenant in Monzie from 1867—that is, for twenty years before this dispute arose—never heard of his landlord or anybody else using the Cromalton Pass in order to get from his farm to the east side of Carnlia.

There are two incidents established by the proof which appear to me to have a significant bearing upon this part of the case.

The first of these occurred between 1852 and 1857, and is spoken of by John Stewart, at that time a forester in the employment of the late Duke of Athole. The Duke was in the pass with his retainers when he saw the late Mr M'Inroy of Lude and his keeper, who were also going through the pass westwards, having entered it from the east. The Duke, in the hearing of the witness, who was close beside him, gave orders to his head keeper to go and turn back the intruders. The order was obeyed, and the witness said Mr M'Inroy and his keeper returned in the direction from which they came. I see no reason to question the accuracy of this statement. The Lord Ordinary, before whom the witness was examined, suggests no doubt as to his credibility, although he makes light of the circumstance, mainly because Mr M'Inroy continued notwithstanding to assert and use his right. I should agree with the Lord Ordinary's estimate if I were, as he appears to have been, satisfied that the previous and subsequent user were open to observation and known to the person who challenged it on that occasion. Persistent use in the face of challenge is a clear assertion of right; but I can find no grounds for supposing that Mr M'Inroy, either previously or subsequently, used the track or the pass in such a way as to indicate that he was asserting a right. If that be so—and in my opinion it was so—the conduct of Mr M'Inroy was well calculated to assure his Grace of Athole that he was making no pretension to a right of way through the Cromalton Pass. The next occasion was in September 1882, at a time when the mansion and shootings of Lude were let to Sir A. B. Walker. The present respondent was shooting in the pass when he observed traces of a party having passed along the track with a horse. He immediately wrote to Cameron, the appellants' head keeper, stating his belief that the party must have come from Lude, and intimating that the keepers and others from Lude must understand that they were trespassing when they went up the Cromalton. His Grace treated the trespass as one arising from the inadvertence of the keepers, and informed Cameron that if it were repeated he would be obliged to complain to Mr M'Inroy, who is the leading appellant.

Cameron forwarded the respondent's communication to the appellant under cover of a letter, asking for directions, in which he says with respect to the track,—"I was told some time ago that it was an old drove road; if such is the case, the Duke cannot prevent us taking it." Mr M'Inroy's reply has not been preserved, but the tenour of it may be implied from Cameron's answer, which is in these terms,—"I am glad we have done nothing wrong. I am perfectly sure the late Mr M'Inroy would never have allowed me to cross the Cromalton unless he had right to do it. We have not crossed it since, but will do so some day this week."

Whatever may have been the instructions given by Mr M'Inroy to his keeper, it is certain that he neither answered the respondent's letter himself nor directed his keeper to do so, and that no answer was sent.

I cannot understand why no answer was sent to the respondent's communication, and the appellants' counsel made no attempt to explain it. Going through the pass next week was no answer, unless there was someone there to see on the respondent's behalf. The terms of the communication implied that the writer was unaware of there having been any previous use of the pass, and unless he came to know of its being used subsequently by the Lude people, the silence of Cameron and his master would naturally be construed as an admission of trespass. I entertain no doubt that it was so construed, and that the respondent was unaware of the continuance of the use for five years afterwards.

In these circumstances I have no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that there has not been an open and unequivocal assertion of the rights which the appellants claim, such as the law requires in order to the constitution of a servitude of way; and I therefore move that the interlocutor of the Inner-House be affirmed and the appeal dismissed with costs.

Lord Bramwell.—I agree entirely with the opinion of my noble and learned friend Lord Watson. But as I believe this to be an honest case, I wish to shew the appellants that I have not come to a conclusion they probably will think wrong without forming an opinion of my own on it.

That there would be a path or track in the pass or depression between the two mountains called Cromalton Pass is certain. Whoever and whatever had to go from the east of those mountains to the west, or the west to the east—man, deer, or sheep—would naturally take that route which would be the easiest. Accordingly, we find the marked track, the use of which has been discussed, and we find it has been used in a variety of ways.

The appellants have claimed a right of public way, a right for sheep from the part of Lude on one side of the pass to the other, and a right to pass to and fro for sporting purposes. All these claims are given up except the claim of a right for sporting purposes. Of course there having been claims that could not be maintained would not preclude the appellants from the right to one which they could maintain. But I cannot help thinking that it furnishes an argument against them that there should have been uses of the way which were trespasses or permissive. According to English law, the owner of strayed sheep though liable for their trespass would have a right to get them back, at all events after request to the owner of the land where they were to restore them. But the user in support of the right now alone claimed must be examined.

Now, there is, no doubt, evidence of a user of this path by the occupiers of Lude for the purpose of getting from one side of the pass to the other for sporting purposes on the Lude property; and if that user had been frequent enough to the knowledge of the respondent and the predecessors, and had been persisted in after objection by them, the right might have been established. But in my opinion the user proved is insufficient. In the first place, up to 1841 the Lude proprietors claimed a right to the property in Carnlia, and could go over it, or the lower part of it, from one side to the other without using the path. It is true they did not claim the soil of the path or track, and it may have been easier to go along it than over a place where there was no track. But it certainly is unlikely that they had a right of way over the Duke's ground close alongside what they thought their own property. Admiral M'Inroy speaks doubtfully as to what route he took. There is then the user since 1841, which, I repeat, if sufficient and shewn to be known to the respondent and his predecessors, might establish the right. But there are only two cases where that knowledge is shewn. That in 1857, when the then Duke turned back the then Mr M'Inroy, who submitted, and thereby recognised that he had no right to be on the track. The other is the Duke's letter to the keeper in 1882, communicated to the appellants, and the statements in it not contested. I think these two matters decisive. As to the Athole foresters not informing the Duke, and not objecting to the use of the path, there are not many occasions on which they are shewn to have been aware of its use. I think it quite possible that they may not have known the rights of the case, and if they did, may not have wished to be tale-bearers against persons with whom they had probably some friendship or acquaintanceship, and who perhaps were trespassing when it was not an objectionable time of year. Lastly, there is this, that the place in question was remote, little used, and difficult to protect. Believing though I do in the good faith of the appellant and his witnesses, I am satisfied he has not made out his case.

EARL OF SELBORNE.—I had partly prepared my opinion in this case when I saw in print that which has just been delivered by my noble and learned friend Lord Watson. I found the view which he had taken to agree so entirely with that which I had myself formed, and the manner in which the reasons for that view were stated so satisfactory to my mind, that I thought I should be unnecessarily occupying the time of your Lordships if I did more than express my entire agreement.

THEIR Lordships affirmed the interlocutors appealed from and dismissed the appeal, with costs.

HOLMES OIL COMPANY, LIMITED, Appellants (Pursuers).—Finlay, Q.C.—Dundas.

PUMPHERSTON OIL COMPANY, LIMITED, Respondents (Defenders).—D.-F. Balfour, Q.C.—Ure.

Arbiter—Corruption—Act of Regulations, 1695.—The A company, who were engaged in shale mining and distilling oil from the shale, but had no works for refining the oil after distillation, entered into an agreement with the B company to sell to them the crude oil they distilled. The A company were to be paid a certain price per gallon on the refined products, which were estimated at 72 per cent of the crude oil. The price was to be taken at one-half of the average price obtained by the B company for the refined products sold by them, as ascertained from their books by an accountant named in the contract. "In the event of any questions, disputes, or differences arising as to the true intent and meaning" of the agreement "or the due implement thereof," the same were referred to an arbiter therein named.

After the agreement had been acted upon for two years, and a decree-arbitral had been pronounced by the arbiter relative to certain disputes arising as to the sum payable to the A company by the B company, the A company raised an action of reduction of the accountant's reports fixing the price for these two years and of the decree-arbitral, and for an accounting for the products obtained from the crude oil delivered to the defenders. The action was based on the following averments, viz., the pursuers averred that one of the products obtained from the crude oil was paraffin scale, which was of two kinds—"hard" scale and "soft" scale, the former being worth 1s. 8d. per gallon, and the latter 1s. per gallon only; that it had been understood that the whole of the crude paraffin scale would be sold by the defenders, and that the price was to be fixed on the basis of the average price, but that the defenders had retained the "hard" scale for their own purposes, and had sold the "soft" scale only; that the price brought out in the accountant's reports was only that of the soft scale; that the arbiter had pronounced the award brought under reduction, finding that it was not admissible to take into consideration the different qualities of scale, but only the amount actually received from the various products during the year for which the estimate was made, notwithstanding that the pursuers had maintained that hard scale ought to be taken into account in fixing the price, and had offered proof that the scale sold consisted only of soft scale, and did not therefore represent the total scale produced. They averred that the defenders, the B company, had fraudulently concealed from the accountant that they were only selling soft scale, and had represented to him that the scale they sold consisted in fair proportions of both soft and hard scale, and that the arbiter had refused to go behind the figures brought out by the accountant, and had thus acted illegally and corruptly, in the sense of the Act of Regulations, 1695.

The Second Division, with three consulted Judges, by a majority held that the action was not relevant.

In an appeal the pursuers contended that the decree-arbitral should be reduced on the ground that the arbiter had misconducted the case by refusing to allow evidence tendered by the pursuers. Held that as the arbiter had construed the contract in a way which made the evidence tendered irrelevant, there was no ground for reduction, and appeal dismissed.

Ld. Chancellor (Halsbury).
Lord Watson.
Ld. Herschell.

The pursuers appealed.

The pursuers contended, inter alia, that the arbiter had misconducted the case in refusing to allow evidence tendered by them to shew that the defenders had not sold the whole scale, but had retained the hard scale, which was more valuable than the soft scale which they had sold, and had thereby brought out a low average price for the scale sold.

Lord Chancellor.—I agree with a remark which was made by the learned counsel as to doing justice in this case, and I have approached the case with the strongest possible desire, if I could, to do justice between the parties, which I think ought to be done, assuming that the facts suggested are true. But the matter is not here for review; apart from the particular form in which the question arises, this is in substance an attempt to set aside an award. Now, one of the advantages which people are supposed to get by a reference to arbitration is the finality of the proceeding when the arbitrator has once stated his determination. They sacrifice something for that advantage—they sacrifice the power to appeal. If, in their judgment, the particular judge whom they have selected has gone wrong in point of law or in point of fact, they have no longer the same wide power to appeal which an ordinary citizen prosecuting his remedy in the Courts of law possesses, but they sacrifice that advantage in order to obtain a final decision between the parties. It is well-settled law, therefore, that when they have agreed to refer their differences to arbitration, as they have here, you cannot set aside the award simply because you think it wrong. The parties have agreed that it shall not be subject to the ordinary modes of appeal, and that it shall be final; and that is, in nine cases out of ten, the very object which they mean to attain by submitting their differences to arbitration.

In this case the arbiter has, to my mind, clearly decided the question in dispute between the parties; and in truth what he has decided—at all events the substance of his decision—is, that there being a dispute as to how much one of the parties shall pay to the other party, he has given the amount in terms and in figures which the one party shall pay to the other. Thereupon one of the parties, the party against whom he has decided, says—"Oh! but you have proceeded upon a wrong principle; you have not allowed the price of the article to be ascertained in the way contemplated by the contract." The arbiter to whom that matter is remitted says—"I have looked at the contract, and I find that the only mode in which the price is to be ascertained is by taking the average during the year of the price received for all these articles. Well, I look at the average of the price received for all these articles, and I arrive at such and such a conclusion upon the figures stated, and for the amount so arrived at I give my award." Upon which the other party says—"But the average was to be an average ascertained by considering all the things which were not only in fact sold, but which ought to have been sold, or considered as sold, or treated as sold, and taking the price of them as received during the period of the year." To that it is replied—"Well, but that is not the contract between the parties; the parties have selected a particular mode of ascertaining the amount, and the arbiter finds that that is the mode."

For myself, as I have said during the argument, I am unable to concur with the learned arbiter in the view which he has taken of this matter, but still that is a matter which he has decided, and that is the view which he has taken. He has, as I think, left us in no doubt whatever of the ground on which he had decided before when a dispute took place between the parties in which the question was—Can you consider, for the purpose of ascertaining what is to be paid by the one to the other, the amount of stock which remains over after the year has elapsed and which has not been sold? Upon which the party objecting to this mode of ascertaining the average says—"No, no, we must treat that as unsold, and for this purpose it does not enter into the question of what is to be paid." That may have been right or it may have been wrong, but that was their contention, and the arbiter acquiesced in that contention. He said, "That is the view I take of the contract." Time passes on, and then comes the question which has been debated before your Lordships, as to whether, although not remaining in stock, account ought to be taken of the quantity of material consumed by the manufacturing company (because since the beginning of the year they had turned themselves into a manufacturing company) neither sold in the ordinary course of the market, nor, in the language of the contract, any price received for it in that character. The arbiter says (I do not concur in this view) —"I adhere to my former decision; you yourselves say, 'You must strictly abide by the language of the contract'; and I cannot find any average here to be derived from goods sold and the price received, and therefore I must proceed on the former assumption—I must proceed only on the language of the contract."

July 17, 1891. Holmes Oil Co., Limited, v. Pumpherston Oil Co., Limited.

That being the state of facts, it is said now that the arbiter has misconducted himself. I confess I think that the language of the English law is more applicable to the grounds upon which you can set aside an award than the Regulations of 1695, where it is said that misconduct in an arbiter shall include not only the three heads there recited, but all conduct on the part of an arbiter which is inconsistent with natural justice in deciding between man and man. If he declines to hear material evidence, his conduct is such that he is obviously not complying with the ordinary principles of judicial proceedings. In our English law we call that misconduct, and an award may be set aside by reason thereof. I doubt very much whether those words of the Regulation of 1695 are applicable to mere misconduct of that kind.

Now, the alleged misconduct here is, that the arbiter has refused not to hear the parties but to hear certain evidence. I cannot help thinking that both Mr Finlay and his learned junior have a little fallaciously used the words "refused to hear." The arbiter has not refused to hear the parties at all; he has heard them, and has considered their arguments. What he has refused to do is to admit a class of evidence which upon his view of the contract would undoubtedly be irrelevant, and Mr Finlay and his learned junior do not contend that if the arbiter's view of the contract was right that evidence would be relevant at all. To my mind the language of the arbiter unmistakeably points to the fact that he refused to admit that evidence because in his view of the contract he considered that that evidence would be irrelevant, and in his view of the contract that evidence was irrelevant. The result is, that there is no ground or pretence for saying that the arbiter has misconducted himself in that respect. He may have been wrong. I have already indicated my view of what the true interpretation of the contract and the mode in which the price ought to be ascertained is —but that is not the question before your Lordships. The question here is, whether the arbiter has misconducted himself in respect of having refused to hear relevant and proper evidence which was essential to the determination of the question between the parties? In the view which he took of the contract, the construction of which was a question for him, and him alone, that evidence was irrelevant; he rightly rejected the evidence upon that view, and we have no power to review what he has done in that matter. He has determined what the contract rights of the parties were, and we have not to consider his decision as to those rights.

For these reasons, my Lords, it appears to me to be abundantly clear that this appeal must be dismissed and the interlocutors appealed from affirmed, and I move your Lordships accordingly.

LORD WATSON.—In this case I find myself very much in the same position as the Lord Chancellor, because the facts as alleged, taking them so far as admitted, appear to me to shew that the arbiter has put a very singular construction upon the contract between these parties, a construction which involves considerable hardship to the appellants, but at the same time I am bound to remember that the merits of this case are not and cannot be competently drawn under review in this House. The parties have chosen their own judge, and so far as his decision has been honestly given, they must submit to it, whether it be according to law or not.

The learned arbiter in this case has determined, under the powers given to him by the contract, the amount or price which was payable during certain years for the crude oil furnished by the appellants to the respondents. In so far as that decision is on the merits, it is protected by the provisions of the Regulation of 1695, and although in the course of the argument some observations were addressed to the House which seemed to point to the decree being in violation of the terms of that Regulation, I think the only serious argument latterly insisted in by the appellants was founded upon the allegation, not that the arbiter had corruptly given a judgment upon the materials before him, but that there had been misconduct on his part in declining to receive evidence which was tendered to him before he proceeded to dispose of the question submitted.

Now, I am of opinion that that ground of exception, which may be a good ground of exception to the validity of the award, does not rest at all upon the Regulations of 1695. I think that in so far as regards the conduct of the case, and in so far as regards the jurisdiction of the arbiter to dispose of the case, the Regulations of 1695 make no provision whatever. These rest upon the common law. The arbiter must confine himself to the jurisdiction which the parties have conferred upon him, and in the conduct of the arbitration before it comes to final judgment he is bound to observe any condition which the parties may have chosen to impose upon him by the deed of submission, and he must also conform to all those rules for securing the proper administration of justice which the law implies in the case of every proceeding before an arbiter as well as in the case of every proceeding before a Court of justice.

Now, the refusal to admit evidence complained of in this case would have been quite sufficient and conclusive to vitiate the award if it had been clear upon the averments of the parties that the point to be determined by the arbiter involved nothing more than a pure question of fact. When that is the nature of the issue raised for his determination the principles of natural justice require that before proceeding to decide it the arbiter shall receive from the parties all the evidence of fact which can enable him to arrive at a proper and just conclusion as between them. But that is not the nature of the question which was then submitted. Whether the evidence ought or ought not to have been received, whether this question of fact ever would arise or not, depended upon the construction which the arbiter might put upon the contract; and I need not say that the construction of the contract, either as necessitating or as excluding the necessity for evidence, is a matter entirely committed by the terms of this submission to the arbiter, and, accordingly, his decision upon that point is protected by the very same sanction which protects his judgment upon the merits of any other question which may be raised before him.

Now, the arbiter's final award has taken the shape of a judgment determining the price payable, and ordaining the appellants to repay a certain amount which had been overpaid to them in the view which the arbiter took of the proper amount. We have, however, set forth in the fourteenth article of the condescendence the findings upon which that decree-arbitral proceeded, and also the note which the learned arbiter appended to those findings, which were issued for the consideration of the parties about three weeks before the formal decree-arbitral was extended.

It has been held by this House that in considering the effect of a decree-arbitral a Court of law is bound to take into account and to read along with that decree the findings of the arbiter upon which it proceeds as explanatory of the views to which by his formal judgment he intended to give effect. Those materials your Lordships have here; and the note appended to these findings is, in my opinion, conclusive upon this point, that the arbiter rejected the evidence not because he was unwilling to hear proof from the parties upon a relevant question of fact, but because, upon the construction of the contract which seemed to him to be the right one, he was of opinion that the facts proposed to be made the subject of inquiry were not relevant. I cannot otherwise construe two sentences in that note. I take the last of these sentences first. He says,—"In the absence of an allegation of fraudulent dealing, I think the principle must be followed of estimating the price according to the amount received from the various products during each year." That is a plain affirmance of the correctness of the accountant's report, who had taken from the books of the respondents the amounts received for the various products during each year, and had made these the materials from which he had extracted the average price which under certain deductions was payable to the appellants. Now, if that was the correct principle, to inquire into the amount of hard scale and the amount of soft scale which went to make the particular item of scale in the accountant's report would have been a very idle proceeding, for it would simply have led to this, to extracting and making a second item containing all the materials of the first, and neither the summation nor the average arrived at would have been effective to any extent whatever.

The first part of the note, which in logical sequence ought to be the last, is this,—"The admissibility of taking into consideration the different qualities of scale was decided by me in the negative in a previous stage of the reference between the parties." It is said that these words do not indicate that the learned arbiter meant to proceed upon any construction of the contract, or to determine that proof upon the subject was inadmissible. I am quite unable to take that view of the language of the arbiter. When it is read in connection with the passage to which I have already referred, its meaning becomes perfectly clear. But even if it were taken by itself the language seems to me to be altogether free from ambiguity. If it were inadmissible, as the arbiter in plain terms says it was, to take into consideration the different qualities of scale, of what relevancy could a proof directed to the different qualities of scale have been? The learned arbiter seems to have thought that he had decided it before. With the ground upon which he came to that conclusion we have no concern. He may have been in error; he may have been mistaken in supposing that his judgment on the former occasion constituted a proceeding directly bearing upon the point which he was deciding. That appears to me not to be of the smallest consequence. His conduct is not said in any way to have been corrupt, or to have been in any other way a violation of the Regulations of 1695.

Therefore it seems to me that this portion of the award being entirely within the competency of the arbiter, unless it is successfully assailed upon the ground which I have indicated, the case of the appellants must necessarily fail.

LORD HERSCHELL.—I entirely agree with what has been said by my noble and learned friends who have preceded me. The view which I take of this case, and the reasons which have led me to the conclusion that it is impossible in any way to interfere with this decree-arbitral, are to my mind completely and satisfactorily set forth in the judgment of Lord Rutherfurd Clark in the Court below.

LORD MORRIS concurred.

The "Niobe."

DAVID M'COWAN, Appellant (Defender).—Finlay, Q.C.—Joseph Walton. BAINE & JOHNSTON, Respondents (Pursuers).—Att.-Gen. Sir R. E. Webster—J. Gorell Barnes, Q.C.—D. C. Leck.

Insurance—Marine insurance—Collision clause—Vessel under tow—Damage caused by tug to stranger ship.—In a policy of marine insurance the underwriters insured the ship "Niobe" "from the Clyde (in tow) to Cardiff . . . while there and thence to Singapore," and agreed "that if the ship hereby insured shall come into collision with any other ship or vessel, and the insured shall in consequence thereof become liable to pay, and shall pay, to the persons interested in such other ship or vessel . . . any sum or sums of money, . . . " to pay the insured a certain proportion of the sum so paid. Through the fault of the "Niobe" and of her tug the latter came into collision with and sunk another vessel, whose owners recovered damages both from the "Niobe" and the tug.

In an action by the owners of the "Niobe" upon the policy against one of the underwriters for payment of his proportion of the sum paid by the pursuers on account of the collision, the defender pleaded that under the policy he was only liable for damage arising from collision with the "Niobe."

Held (aff. judgment of Second Division), diss. Lord Bramwell, that in maritime usage the word "ship" was frequently understood to cover a ship and the tug by which it was towed, and that it fell to be construed in this sense in the collision clause of the policy, and that the defender was liable.

EARL OF SELBORNE.—I cannot help thinking that in construing such a mercantile contract as this there is as much danger of error in extreme literalism as in too much latitude; and though I do not adopt the argument that a contract of indemnity against the consequences of collision can be extended to a case in which there has been no collision, but only damages caused by measures properly taken to avoid a collision, I think a construction which makes it cover all damages consequent upon an actual collision, for which the assured is liable, is more reasonable and more in accordance with the probable intention of the parties (if the words will bear it) than one which does not.

In the present case the "Valetta" was sunk by an actual collision, for which the owners of the "Niobe" have been held liable. But the impact which caused the loss of the "Valetta" was not of the hull of the "Niobe," but of the steam-tug "Flying Serpent," which was towing the "Niobe" on a part of her insured voyage, described in the policy of insurance as "in tow from the Clyde to Cardiff $\frac{\text{and}}{\text{or}}$ Penarth."

The words of this contract are: "If the ship hereby insured shall come into collision with any other ship or vessel, and the insured shall, in consequence thereof, become liable to pay, and shall pay, to the persons interested in such other ship or vessel, or in the freight thereof, or in the goods or effects on board thereof, any sum or sums of money, not exceeding the value of the ship hereby assured." If a ship cannot be said to "come into collision with any other ship" except by direct contact, causing damage, between the two hulls (including under the term hull all parts of a ship's structure) there was in this case no such contact, and the appellants ought to succeed.

But I cannot adopt so narrow a construction of those words. I should hold them to extend to cases in which the injury was caused by the impact, not only of the hull of the ship insured, but of her boats or steam launch, even if those accessories were not (as in this case) insured as being, in effect, parts of the ship. I should also hold them to cover an indirect collision, through the impact of the ship insured upon another vessel or thing capable of doing damage, which might by such impact be driven against the ship suffering damage. I should take the same view, as against insurers in similar terms, of a tug towing one or more barges (in which case the barge owners would not be liable for a collision) if damage to any vessel were caused by the barge or barges being driven against it through the improper navigation of the tug, although there might have been no impact of the tug itself upon the injured vessel. And, after full consideration, it seems to me to be no more than a reasonable extension of the same principle to include within them such a case as the present.

Where a ship in tow has control over, and is answerable for, the navigation of the tug, the two vessels—each physically attached to the other for a common operation, that of the voyage of the ship in tow, for which the tug supplies the motive power—have been said, by high authority, to be for many purposes properly regarded as one vessel. Lord Kingsdown's words, in the case of The "Independence"[1] were, that the tug, "may, for many purposes, be considered as a part of the ship to which she is attached"; and he went on to repeat the reason given in the earlier judgment reported in the same volume, The "Cleadon,"[2] to which he was also a party, where it was said: The "Cleadon" being in tow of the tug, it is admitted she and the tug must be considered to be one ship; the motive power being in the tug and the governing power in the ship that was being towed." I think the "Flying Serpent" and the "Niobe" may be so regarded for the purpose now in question. The principle on which the "Niobe" has been held liable for the collision seems to me to go far towards that conclusion. That the "Niobe" should be in tow from the Clyde to Cardiff or Penarth was, in the present case, part of the contract. I think the construction ought to be the same, so far as relates to that voyage, as if the words in the margin had been: "If the ship insured, while in tow between the Clyde and Cardiff or Penarth, shall come into collision with any other vessel," &c. If the contract had been so expressed, I should have thought it arbitrary and not reasonable to exclude a collision by the impact of the tug during that voyage upon another vessel, for the consequences of which the owners of the "Niobe" were liable.

[1] 14 Moo. P. C. at p. 115.

[2] 14 Moo. P. C. at p. 97.

I am, for these reasons, of opinion that the interlocutors appealed from are right, and ought to be affirmed.

LORD WATSON.—The "Niobe," a sailing ship belonging to the respondents, was covered by a policy of insurance at and from "the Clyde (in tow) to Cardiff and Penarth, while there, and thence to Singapore, and while in port for thirty days after arrival." Provision was made for indemnity against liabilities arising from collision by a marginal clause, upon the construction of which the result of this appeal must depend.

Whilst the "Niobe" was on her way to Cardiff in tow of the "Flying Serpent," her tug came into collision with the "Valetta," causing her serious damage. The "Valetta," after colliding with the tug, also came into contact with the "Niobe," but without receiving any injury. In a suit before the Admiralty Court of England it was decided by Lord Hannen that the collision was due to the fault of the tug in not porting her helm in terms of the regulations, and that the "Niobe" was likewise to blame in respect of her failure to keep a look-out and to control the steerage of her tug. The respondents have in consequence paid £12,909 to the owners of the "Valetta," and they now sue one of the underwriters of the policy for his proportion of the sum which they claim by way of indemnity.

The legal liability of the "Niobe," and the facts upon which it rests, as these were found by the President of the Admiralty Court, are matter of mutual admission in this case. Whether the collision between the "Flying Serpent" and the "Valetta" was a collision within the meaning of the marginal clause of the policy, is the only subject of controversy.

The material part of the clause is in these terms: "And it is further agreed, that if the ship hereby insured shall come into collision with any other ship or vessel, and the insured shall in consequence thereof become liable to pay, and shall pay, to the persons interested in such other ship or vessel, or in the freight thereof, or in the goods or effects on board thereof, any sum not exceeding the value of the ship hereby assured, we will severally pay the assured such proportion," &c. Then follows a stipulation that, in the same events, in cases where the liability of the ship has been contested with their consent in writing, the insurers will also pay a proportion of the expenses incurred or paid by the insured. Lastly, there is a proviso to the effect that the clause shall not extend to any sum which the assured may become liable to pay or shall pay "in respect of loss of life or personal injury to individuals for any cause whatsoever."

The clause is certainly not conceived in the terms which one would have expected the parties to employ, if, as the Attorney-General argued, it was their intention to include in the indemnity all liabilities arising from collision which the "Niobe" could possibly incur.

M'Cowan v. Baine & Johnston.

The "Niobe."

The condition which must be purified before any obligation can attach to the underwriters is "that the ship hereby insured shall come into collision with another ship or vessel." These words in their literal sense import that there must be contact between the "Niobe" and such other ship or vessel, causing damage to the latter. There are many ways in which a ship under sail may, without being herself in collision, become liable to bear the whole damages resulting from a collision. Her unjustifiable manœuvres may occasion the colliding of two or more vessels other than herself without any blame on their part, and in that case the offending ship, and she alone, is responsible for the consequences of her fault. In such a case I should not be prepared to hold that the "Niobe" had in the sense of the policy "come into collision with" the vessels whom she caused to collide, because there would be no ground in fact or law for the suggestion that the "Niobe" ought to be identified with any one of them.

So far as I can discover, none of the learned Judges of the Court of Session indicated an opinion that the clause was so expressed as to cover every kind of liability for collision. They based their decision upon a special rule of law, which has admittedly no application except as between a ship and her tug. They held that the identity which that rule established between tow and tug is so complete that the "Niobe" herself must be considered to have come into collision with the "Valetta" within the meaning of the policy. A sailing-vessel and the steam-tug which has her in tow have frequently been described by eminent Judges as for certain purposes constituting "one ship"—an expression which has been borrowed by text writers, and is familiar to persons conversant with maritime law. The expression is figurative, and must not be strained beyond the meaning which the learned Judges who have employed it intended it should bear. As I understand their use of the expression, it signifies that the ship and her tug must be regarded as identical in so far as the two vessels, with their connecting tackle, must be navigated as if they were one ship, and, the motive power being with the tug, the two vessels must, in order to comply with the regulations for preventing collision at sea, be steered and manœuvred as if they formed a single steamship; and also, in so far as the ship towed, when she has, as in this case, the control of the tug and the duty of directing the course of the tug in accordance with these regulations, is responsible for the natural consequences of the tug being wrongly steered, through the neglect of her officers or crew to perform that duty.

There was therefore a legal connection betwixt the "Niobe" and the "Flying Serpent" which could not subsist between her and any other vessel which her fault might drive into collision with a stranger ship. The "Niobe" was, in the contemplation of the law, one and the same ship with the "Flying Serpent" for all purposes of their joint navigation with a view to avoid the risk of collision, and the fault which led to a collision between that legal composite and the "Valetta" was admittedly the fault not only of the "Flying Serpent" but of the "Niobe."

I admit the force of the appellant's argument that contracts ought to be construed according to the primary and natural meaning of the language in which the contracting parties have chosen to express the terms of their mutual agreement. But there are exceptions to the rule. One of these is to be found in the case where the context affords an interpretation different from the ordinary meaning of the words, and another in the case where their conventional meaning is not the same with their legal sense. In the latter case the meaning to be attributed to the words of the contract must depend upon the consideration whether in making it the parties had or had not the law in their contemplation. The point thus raised appears to me to be a very narrow one, but in this case the contracting parties are shipowners and underwriters, and the clause in question relates to possible legal liabilities of the ship insured which are entirely dependent upon the rules of maritime law. In these circumstances I have, not without some hesitation, come to the conclusion that they must be presumed to have known the law, and to have contracted on the faith of it.

LORD BRAMWELL.—In this case the facts are that the "Niobe" was insured by the respondents with the appellants and others by a policy in the ordinary form, from the Clyde (in tow) to Cardiff, or Penarth, and thence to Singapore. In the margin of this policy is this, I believe, usual clause: "And it is further agreed that, if the ship hereby insured shall come into collision with any other ship or vessel, and the insured shall, in consequence thereof, become liable to pay, and shall pay," "any sum or sums of money not exceeding the value of the ship hereby assured, we will severally pay the assured such proportion of three-fourths of the sum so paid as our respective subscriptions hereto bear to the value of the ship hereby assured, or if the value hereby declared amounts to a larger sum, then to such declared value."

What happened was this: The "Niobe," in tow of a tug, proceeded on her voyage, and, by the negligence of the tug, and of those navigating the "Niobe" the tug came into collision with the "Valetta," and sank her. There was a collision between the "Niobe" and the "Valetta," which may be disregarded, as it did no damage. In very fact, therefore, the ship has not come into collision with any other ship, and the insured has not paid something in consequence thereof. The insured, the respondents, have paid to the owners of the "Valetta" a large sum of money in consequence of the damage to her, owing to the conjoint bad seamanship of the tug and the "Niobe," and this is sought to be recovered in this suit.

I say then, in very fact the "Niobe" did not come into collision with the "Valetta," causing a liability in the appellant, and, according to the ordinary primary meaning of the words used the case is not within them. This is agreed. But it is said that for some reason the primary and natural meaning of the words is to be extended, and that we should hold that there was a collision where there was none. I am at a loss to see why. I think an Act of Parliament, an agreement, or other authoritative document, ought never to be dealt with in this way, unless for a cause amounting to a necessity, or approaching to it. It is to be remembered that the authors of the document could always have put in the necessary words if they had thought fit. If they did not, it was either because they thought of the matter and would not, or because they did not think of the matter. In neither case ought the Court to do it. In the first case, it would be to make a provision opposed to the intention of the framers of the document; in the other case, to make a provision not in the contemplation of those framers. Take this very case. Can anyone say that, if the assured had required the insurers to agree to be liable for a collision by the tug (and be it remembered that it is mentioned the "Niobe" was to be towed to Cardiff), I say if such a requirement had been made, can anyone say that the insurers would have agreed to it without an increase of premium: a liability for any towing till the voyage to Singapore was over? Suppose a suit to reform the document by making the insurers liable for collisions by the tug, could it have succeeded?

No. 10. July 27, 1891. M'Cowan v. Baine & Johnston. The "Niobe."

Let me examine the reasons given for adding to or altering the meaning of the words used. The Lord Ordinary says if the collision clause is read in the strictest manner he would be of opinion that the defender was not liable, but he thinks it admits of being read in a broader and more comprehensive sense. The superlative "strictest" is a difficult word to deal with. Is it to be read in a way not strict; if so, how far short of it? His Lordship gives his reasons; he says: "The risk they wished and had an interest to cover was liability arising from collision for which, as owners of that particular ship, they might be liable." "That the defender knew they wished to cover it, and it may fairly be presumed that the clause was intended to cover that particular risk." I respectfully ask where is the evidence that they wished to cover any risk of collision beyond what they have expressed, or that the defender knew the pursuers so wished? I firmly believe that if the truth were known, neither party had it in mind; and I repeat, I am by no means sure it would have been included for the same premium. The Lord Justice-Clerk says: "In certain circumstances the vessel in tow is looked upon as being one with the towing vessel, and the real question is whether that view applies to such a case as this. I think it would have been far better if the policy had been more clearly expressed." With submission, that should be not "more clearly" but differently expressed. Nothing can be clearer than it is. It is said that to hold as I do is a "narrow construction." I respectfully deny it. I do not construe the words. I simply read them as I should "twice two are four." Well, if too narrow construction is wrong so is too wide, which, to my mind, the construction (for it is a construction) I object to is. His Lordship came to the conclusion in favour of the pursuer not without hesitation. Lord Young says the collision was just the sort of collision the possibility of which was contemplated by both sides. I suppose, then, he does not agree with the Lord Justice-Clerk, that it would have been far better if more clearly expressed. Lord Rutherfurd Clark doubts if the pursuer is right. Lord Lee agrees with the Lord Ordinary.

It is said that the "Niobe" was, in the contemplation of the law, one and the same ship with the "Flying Serpent" for all purposes of their joint navigation with a view to avoid the risk of collision. I respectfully deny it. The law does not contemplate anything like it. A most distinguished lawyer, Lord Kingsdown, did once use the unfortunate metaphor that "the tug may for many purposes be considered as a part of the ship to which she is attached." He says "for many purposes"—not all. He does not say that it is to be so considered that the plain words of a contract are to be misinterpreted. Had he foreseen what use would be made of his words, he would not have used them. These two shall be one. It is said the parties to this suit knew all about this, and contracted on the footing of it.

Now, this seems to me to be a case (too common) in which there is a tendency to depart from the natural primary meaning of the words and to add to or take from them—to hold that, constructively, words mean something different from what they say. It introduces uncertainty. No case is desperate when plain words may be disregarded. I deprecate this in all cases. In this particular one I believe it will be attended with at least this injustice, that the parties did not contemplate the case that has occurred, and perhaps would have raised the premium if they had. That they did not contemplate it I infer from the words that they used. Ingenious cases were put forward in which there might be damage by collision with the "Niobe" without her touching the vessel damaged, as where she pushed an intermediate vessel against that damaged. I have no doubt that ingenuity might suggest many difficult cases. I content myself with dealing with the present, where the ship did not in any sense come into collision with any other ship and cause damage. I think the judgments should be reversed.

LORD MORRIS.—In my opinion the contract must be construed as an insurance against risk or liability for payment by collision to be incurred by the "Niobe" while in tow. What the owners were bargaining for was indemnity against loss or payment which the "Niobe" might incur while being towed. I consider the tug part of the apparatus for moving the ship "Niobe," and that a collision by the tug while so towing the "Niobe" was a collision of the "Niobe" within the meaning of the marginal clause of the policy; consequently that the judgment of the Court of Session should be affirmed.

THEIR Lordships dismissed the appeal, with costs.

MRS SUSAN CLARKE raised an action in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire at Hamilton against the Carfin Coal Company to recover damages for the death of Laurence Hoolahan, her illegitimate son. The pursuer alleged that the deceased had been in the employment of the defenders, and that through their fault he had met with an accident which resulted in his death; that her son was earning 12s. per week, and that by his death she had been deprived of his assistance in supporting her and her family, and of the future support she could reasonably have expected; and that she had suffered great sorrow through his death.

The defenders pleaded, "No title to sue."

The Sheriff-substitute (Birnie), holding the case to be ruled by Weir v. The Coltness Iron Co., March 16, 1889, 16 R. 614, assoilzied the defenders.

The pursuer appealed to the Second Division of the Court of Session.

The Second Division, in affirming the Sheriff-substitute's judgment, delivered no opinions, as the point had been decided by them in Weir's case.

The pursuer appealed.

LORD WATSON.—This action was brought by the appellant before the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire, for recovery of damages from the respondent company, upon the allegation that the death of her illegitimate son, a boy between fourteen and fifteen years of age, had been occasioned by their fault, and that she had, in consequence, suffered great sorrow and anguish, and had also been deprived of the assistance of her son (who at the time of his death was earning 12s. weekly), in supporting herself and her family.

The Sheriff-substitute assoilzied the respondents, upon the ground that, by the law of Scotland, an action of solatium and damages will not lie at the instance of a natural mother for the death of her bastard child; and his interlocutor was, on appeal, affirmed by the Second Divison of the Court of Session. No opinions were delivered at the advising of the case, which their lordships held to be directly ruled by the previous judgment of the same Division in Weir v. Coltness Iron Co., Limited, March 16, 1889 (16 R. 614), which is practically the judgment submitted to review in this appeal.

In the Court below, as well as at the bar of the House, the appellant relied upon the existence of a continuing and reciprocal obligation between a natural mother and her illegitimate child to aliment each other when necessary, which was recently affirmed and given effect to by the Second Division in Samson v. Davie, Nov. 26, 1886 (14 R. 113). In that case a bastard, forty-five years of age, who had not seen his mother since he was of tender years, except on two occasions, when he did not know that she was his parent, was, at the instance of an inspector of poor, ordained to relieve the parochial board of the burden of her maintenance. Lord Young strongly dissented from the decision, the majority in favour of it being the Lord Justice-Clerk (Lord Moncreiff), the late Lord Craighill, and Lord Rutherfurd Clark.

Starting from that decision the appellant maintained that the law allows an action of solatium and damages to the parent of a legitimate child against the person whose negligence has caused its death, by reason of there having existed, between the pursuer and the deceased, in the first place, near relationship in blood, and, in the second place, a mutual obligation of support arising out of that relationship. It was conceded that there is no legal relationship between a bastard and its parent, but it was argued that, inasmuch as the law considers the natural tie which connects them to be so intimate as to give rise to a reciprocal duty of maintenance which it will enforce, they are within the principle which gives a right of action to persons legitimately connected in the same degree.

On this point reference was made to Eisten v. The North British Railway Company, July 13, 1870 (8 Macph. 980, 42 Scot. Jur. 575), where the Court dismissed an action by two sisters for reparation in respect of the death of a brother upon whom they were dependent, the main ground of the decision being that the law imposed no obligation of support upon their brother. The Lord President (Inglis) in that case (p. 984) said,—"It cannot be disputed that hitherto in our law no such derivative claim has been sustained, except when arising from the relation of husband and wife, or of parent and child; and, on the other hand, it is true that, in the law of Scotland, differing in that respect from some other systems of jurisprudence, a claim of this kind is sustained at the instance of a wife for the death of her husband, a husband for the death of his wife, a parent for the death of his child, and a child for the death of his parent, when the death has been caused by delict or culpa. And it is equally true that this claim may be maintained, although the party raising the action cannot qualify any direct pecuniary loss by the death of the relative.

It appears to me that the true foundation of this claim is partly nearness of relationship between the deceased and the person claiming on account of the death, and partly the existence during life as between the deceased and the claimant of a mutual obligation of support in case of necessity. On these two considerations in combination our law has held that persons standing in one of these relations to the deceased may sue an action like this for solatium where he can qualify no real damage, and for pecuniary loss in addition where such loss can be proved."

In Weir v. The Coltness Iron Co., Limited, all the learned Judges were of opinion that if the decision in Samson v. Davie, in which two of their number, (Lords Young and Rutherfurd Clark) had taken part were regarded as conclusive of the case before them, it would be necessary to hear further argument, and probably to consult the other Judges. They did not find it necessary to adopt that course, and proceeded to dispose of the case upon the assumption that Samson v. Davie was well decided. Shortly stated, their ground of decision was, that such an action, at the instance of a natural parent, was unknown to the law, and that it was for the Legislature, and not for the Court, to determine whether a remedy ought to be given to a person in the position of the pursuer.

I concur in the reasons assigned by the learned Judges for their decision. As a matter of fact it cannot be disputed that, although for a century past actions for solatium and damages have been sustained at the instance of husband, wife, or legitimate child in respect of the death of a spouse, a child, or a parent, a similar action at the instance of a natural parent or child had never (with one exception, which appears to me to be of no moment) been heard of in the law of Scotland. In my opinion the rule, which admits the former class of suits, does not rest upon any definite principle, capable of extension to other cases which may seem to be analogous, but constitutes an arbitrary exception from the general law which excludes all such actions, founded in inveterate custom, and having no other ratio to support it. I venture to think that the Lord President, in Eisten v. The North British Railway Company, did not mean to suggest that the rule (or rather the exception) was capable of being extended to cases other than those in which it had already been received. To my mind it is evident that by "nearness of relationship," his Lordship meant legal relationship, because he treats as an essential element of the pursuer's claim the right to demand solatium, which is a right to reparation for disruption of the family tie, and therefore impossible in the case of natural parent and child, and also because his Lordship subsequently describes the connection between a bastard and his putative father as "one which the law cannot recognise."

The solitary exception to which I have referred is the judgment of a Lord Ordinary (Jerviswoode) in 1867 (3 S. L. R. 192), sustaining the competency of an action of this kind by a bastard's mother. The case has not been traced further, and it does not, in my opinion, constitute a precedent of any value. In his note, as reported, the learned Judge is represented as having said that, on the merits of the case, he did not entertain any serious doubt. The rest of the note does not suggest that any of the real difficulties which beset the question had been brought before his Lordship, who presumably gave judgment on the footing that there was a mutual obligation of support between the pursuer and the deceased. That such mutuality exists was admittedly not decided by the Court of Session until 1887 in Samson v. Davie, which appears to have led to Weir v. The Coltness Iron Company, Limited, and the present case.

July 27, 1891. Clarke v. Carfin Coal Co.

Although I have, for the reasons already stated, come to the conclusion that the decision of the Court below is right in law, I understand some of your Lordships to be of opinion that these reasons afford a narrow if not an insufficient ground for affirming the interlocutors under appeal. I have, in these circumstances, thought it right, with the aid of the arguments and of the authorities which were submitted to us, to examine the judgment of the Court of Session in Samson v. Davie, which has not been brought under appeal. If that decision be not accepted as a correct exposition of the law, the case of the appellant, upon her own argument, must necessarily fail.

By the law of Scotland there are certain disabilities attached to the condition of bastardy as to which there can be room for dispute. To borrow language used by the Scottish bench in the year 1692, bastards are regarded as "unlawful productions" which "are not to be encouraged"—(Vide Ker v. Tutors of Moriston, M. Dict. 1363). Unless legitimated by the subsequent marriage of his parents, the bastard has no place in the family of either. In intestacy, he has no right of succession to them in heritage or in moveables, and he cannot inherit from anyone through them. Should his parents bequeath property to him, he must pay the highest rate of succession or legacy-duty, as the case may be, not because the Legislature has so prescribed, but because he is, in the eye of the common law, a stranger to them in blood.

It humbly appears to me that to impose upon illegitimate children, to whom the law denies the status of blood-relationship and all rights of succession, a liability to maintain parents, who, in the most charitable view, have done them a great wrong, would be harsh and inequitable, and I am of opinion that no such rule ought to be enforced, unless it is shewn to have been firmly established in the law of Scotland. It was no doubt held to be established in Samson v. Davie, but it is not without significance that Lord Moncreiff, one of the majority, said, in giving judgment,—"It is true there is a paucity of authority. But there are some cases and dicta." An examination of the books has satisfied me that the dearth of authorities tending to support the rule is even greater than the language of the noble and learned Lord would seem to indicate.

Before adverting to the authorities, there are two expressions, upon which I desire to remark, which have been frequently used by Scotch Judges in bastardy cases and by text writers, one of which appears to me to have been sometimes employed in a way calculated to mislead. It has often been laid down that a bastard is filius nullius. Of that expression it is sufficient to say that it is as true in a legal as it is untrue in a natural sense. Again, it has been said that a bastard has a mother but no father. The phrase is unobjectionable, so long as it is only meant to express the obvious fact that the maternity of a bastard is, comparatively speaking, a matter of certainty, whereas its paternity may be matter of doubt, and in some cases the father may never be identified. It becomes, in my opinion, mischievous when it is used to convey the suggestion that, after the father has been ascertained, by admission or by judicial proof, the natural tie which connects him with the child is more slender and less enduring than that which binds the child to its mother. There is no principle of natural law which can justify such a distinction, and, beyond a few loose dicta, I can find no authority for it in the law of Scotland.

Lord Stair, in his Institutions published in 1693, treats (i. 5, 8, and 9) of the duty of legitimate children to relieve the wants of their necessitous parents according to their ability, a duty which he traces to the law of nature, and to a remuneratory obligation on the child, corresponding to the parental duty of educating and maintaining it, not only during its continuance in the family, but after emancipation. In a subsequent part of his work the learned author (iii. 3, 43, et seq.) explains the incapacity of bastards to succeed to the estate of their progenitors, but he nowhere deals with the alimentary rights or liabilities depending upon their natural relation to their parents. He does suggest (iv. 12, 1), and the same view is expressed by Lord Bankton (i. 2, 4), that bastards ought not to be excluded from the moveable succession of their mother and her relations; but as Mr. Erskine points out (iii. 10, 9), that rule would be a novelty in the law of Scotland.

Bankton, who wrote about the middle of the eighteenth century, after stating the law with respect to legitimates, proceeds to say (i. 6, 18),—"Natural children or bastards, even those which are the issue of adulterous or incestuous embraces, are entitled to aliment from their parents; according to the canon law and the dictates of nature it is equally incumbent on both, if they are able; and if the one is not, the other must undergo the whole, till they are capable to do for themselves, or to labour for their bread." In a subsequent paragraph (i. 6, 20) he lays down the doctrine that, in case of necessity, the parents must depend upon the children, and that the children are naturally bound to maintain them. It was argued for the appellant that the learned author meant to include in that rule illegitimate as well as legitimate children, an interpretation which I am unable to accept, for two reasons. In the first place, the rule evidently relates back to the obligation previously stated by him to be incumbent upon married parents, to support their issue, not only during the minority, but during "other incapacity of the persons to support themselves" (i. 6, 16, ad fin.), and merely introduces a reciprocal obligation on the part of the children. In the second place, I can hardly suppose that the writer meant to lay a reciprocal obligation upon children, who, according to his previous statement, were only entitled to parental support until they were able to "do for themselves."

Erskine, whose Institute is about thirty years later than Bankton's Treatise, lays down the law in terms which appear to me to assume that the obligation of natural parents does not endure beyond the period during which the child is, from its youth, unable to support itself. He says (i. 6, 56),—"It does not seem fixed in general how long parents are bound to maintain their natural children. In the case of a gentleman, the obligation was found to continue till the child was fourteen years of age—Paterson v. Cochran (M. Dict. 11,080)." These words obviously refer to the length of time for which the parents are bound to educate and aliment their child, in pupillarity or minority, and have no reference to the case of a bastard, who, having attained majority and become self-supporting, is reduced to indigence.

The next authority is a passage from the MSS. Lectures of Baron Hume, Professor of Scots Law in the University of Edinburgh during the present century. I think it right to refer to that passage because it was relied on by one at least of the majority in Samson v. Davie. It has been preserved by the late Lord Fraser in his treatise upon Parent and Child (edit. 1866, p. 127), and is in these terms:—"There is no obligation on a natural child to aliment his reputed father; at least it is an extremely doubtful question. The contrary holds with respect to the mother, however, whom the child is always bound to support, if she be in indigent circumstances." Where Baron Hume, who was a very able lawyer, found that doctrine does not appear, because he cites no authority in support of it. But it is clear that all the authorities, if any, upon which it could be based, are as accessible to the profession now as they were to the learned lecturer.

I now come to the decisions of the Court of Session, which, if not the only, are at least the most reliable source from which the true state of the law can be ascertained. The printed decisions range over a period of nearly 200 years, beginning with the case of Ker v. Tutors of Moriston (already cited) in 1692, and ending with Samson v. Davie in 1887. It is unnecessary to refer to them in detail, because the sum and substance of what they do decide can be stated within a narrow compass.

First of all, they settle, in conformity with the text of Bankton and Erskine, that there is a joint obligation upon both parents to maintain their natural child until it becomes capable of earning its own livelihood; and that the inability of either parent casts the whole liability on the other. The duty of maintenance to that extent is, in my opinion, one which the parents owe as much to the community of which they are members as to the child whom they have irregularly brought into the world. The bulk of these cases involve nothing more than the conflicting claims of the father and mother to the custody of their pupil bastard, a controversy which throws no light upon the question which your Lordships have to decide.

As a necessary consequence of the rule, that support must be given by the parents until the child is able to provide for itself, it has been repeatedly held that the parental obligation continues, even after majority, in cases where, owing to mental or physical infirmity, the child remains incapable of gaining its own subsistence. In pursuance of that principle, the Scots Poor Law Act (8 and 9 Vict. c. 83, sec. 80) has made desertion or neglect to maintain their unemancipated child an offence, punishable by fine or imprisonment, in the case of a natural mother or putative father, as in the case of married parents.

In Anderson v. Heritors and Kirk-Session of Lauder, March 11, 1848 (10 D. 960, 20 Scot. Jur. 332), the Lord Ordinary (Cunninghame) said in his note,—"The only ground upon which it occurred that a plea might be stated for the defender (the putative father) was, as to his legal obligation ex intervallo to afford aliment to an illegitimate daughter, which, under the circumstances, seems a novel claim. She must once have been working for herself for a series of years; and as in law she never would have been bound to aliment the father if he had come to poverty, it might be questioned if he was now bound to aliment her. But, as no plea is raised on this ground, it is probably felt to be untenable. It was further stated that the daughter never had been able to work for her bread from some bodily maladies; if so, the case is the same as if a party begat a child born insane, or with incurable disease. In that case, the obligation of her father, if solvent, to maintain the child till her death could hardly be disputed." The case came by advocation from the Sheriff Court, where, apparently, the inquiry had been confined to the fact of the defender's paternity; and in the Court of Session it does not appear to have been disputed by the defender that the child had never been able to earn its livelihood. The opinion of the learned Judge, which is somewhat speculative, goes no further than this, that a claim against a putative father for the maintenance of his child becoming indigent, after it had been self-supporting, was, in the year 1848, an entire novelty, and that, if the liability did exist, it gave rise to no corresponding obligation on the part of the child.

Clarke v. Carfin Coal Co.

In Corrie v. Adair, Feb. 24, 1860 (22 D. 897, 32 Scot. Jur. 377), which was an action by the mother against the father for recovery of aliment for their bastard child, the Lord President (then Lord Justice-Clerk) stated that there is no obligation on a bastard to maintain its putative father. His Lordship said (p. 900),—"The bastard having no father, what is the relation of the man by whom paternity has been admitted, or against whom it has been proved? It is not a relation which creates reciprocal duties and obligations. The father has no right of custody of the bastard's person, or of administration of his estate, he has none of the characteristics of the patria potestas. The only relation is that the father is to a certain extent, and under certain conditions, liable to aliment the child. But, even in the matter of aliment the relation between a bastard child and his father is different from that between a legitimate child and his father. In the latter case the obligations are reciprocal, but they are not so in the former. The only vestige of connection is the obligation on the part of the father under certain conditions to contribute to the maintenance of the child while unable to support itself."

In the subsequent case of Reid v. Moir, July 13, 1866 (4 Macph. 1060), an observation was made by Lord Cowan in regard to the different character of the relations between a bastard and its male and female parents respectively. There was no question of bastardy raised in the case, which was an action by an inspector of poor against a husband for aliment supplied by the parish to the indigent parents of his wife. Lord Cowan said,—"Your Lordship has referred to the case of a bastard child. I am not prepared to give any decided opinion upon that case, which is a peculiar one, and as I view this question, it is not necessary for its decision. At the same time I see no reason to doubt that the same principle is applicable to both cases. What I hesitate about is this, I do not think there is the same reciprocity of obligation between a bastard child and its putative father as there is between a legitimate child and its legitimate father. There may be an obligation on the part of a bastard child to aliment its mother; but I do not know of any authority for holding that the same applies to the putative father."

To return to the decisions. There is no case in which a parent (whether father or mother) who had launched a bastard into the world, after educating and fitting the child to support itself, has been held liable upon the child subsequently becoming indigent to relieve its necessities. And there is not a single case before Samson v. Davie in which it was held, and (excepting Lord Cowan's dictum in Reid v. Moir), none in which it has been suggested, that a bastard is under any obligation to support either one or other of his parents when they fall into poverty.

I have now noticed in detail all the authorities which were before the Court in Samson v. Davie, so far as these consisted of the law expounded by institutional writers, decisions, or judicial dicta; and I have also briefly indicated the points which, down to 1868, had and had not been established by judicial decision. None of these authorities support the doctrine affirmed in Samson v. Davie, with the exception of one passage in the lectures of Baron Hume, and one obiter dictum of the late Lord Cowan. I think it unfortunate that Lord Cowan, after stating that he was not prepared to express, and that it was unnecessary to express, any opinion upon the case of a bastard child, should nevertheless have proceeded to use language which has been frequently represented as a deliberate statement of his Lordship's opinion. I venture to doubt whether the learned Judge intended his words to be so construed.

July 27, 1891. Clarke v. Carfin Coal Co.

In Samson v. Davie, Lord Cowan's dictum was much relied on by Lord Craighill, who thus endeavoured to explain the difference which it suggests between the relation of a bastard to its mother and the relation of a bastard to its putative father. "In the eye of the law, the woman bearing the child, and the child to which she gives birth are mother and son, whereas the child that is born and the man who is made liable for a contribution of aliment, the putative father, are in law in no way related." That statement appears to me to be absolutely incorrect, if the relation of the bastard to each of its parents be tested by the same legal standard. It does correctly set forth the relation between child and mother according to the law of nature, and also the relation between child and father according to the common law. It ignores the fact that at common law the mother is, as much as the father, an utter stranger in blood to her child; and that, by natural law, the father is as nearly related to the child as its mother. Reason and authority are both against the existence of any liability on the part of the bastard to support its father in his indigence; and I have been unable to discover any considerations which render the bastard's natural tie to its mother such as to raise a reciprocal obligation of support.

Some of the learned Judges in Samson v. Davie seem to have regarded as authoritative passages in the Digest which undoubtedly bear that a mother and her bastard child, or vulgo quæsitus, are reciprocally bound to support each other. Lord Moncreiff observed that "texts of the civil law are not indeed authorities but illustrations, and very important illustrations." I agree with Lord Young in thinking that the rules of the civil law in the age of Justinian furnish a very unsafe guide to the law of Scotland touching the personal relations of parents and their children, whether legitimate or illegitimate. The two systems of jurisprudence differ widely in regard to the relations between parent and child, and the principles upon which these ought to rest; and I am not prepared to accept, in cases like this, any canon of the Roman law, which is not clearly shewn to have been adopted as part of the law of Scotland.

The appellant relied upon seven decisions by the Sheriff or his substitute in five different counties, between 1851 and 1858, finding an adult self-supporting bastard liable in aliment to the natural mother. These were submitted to the Judges in Samson v. Davie, but were not noticed by them, obviously because decisions of the inferior Courts do not constitute the law. It might be otherwise if, upon the faith of them, rights had been created which it would be inexpedient to disturb. But it is idle to suggest that any Scotch bastard has been begotten and born since 1851 in reliance upon his future liability to support his mother.

Being of opinion that there is not in the law of Scotland sufficient trustworthy authority to support the judgment in Samson v. Davie, I think the interlocutors appealed from must be affirmed and the appeal dismissed, and I move accordingly.

EARL OF SELBORNE.—I concur in the motion which my noble and learned friend Lord Watson has made.

Apart from the decision of the Second Division in Samson v. Davie, there is an entire absence of authority in the appellant's favour; for I cannot regard one recent judgment of a Lord Ordinary, in a case which (so far as appears) never went further, as of any weight as authority. The general rule of the law of Scotland (as of England) with a view, no doubt, to the encouragement of marriage and the discouragement of illicit connections, is not to recognise the natural relationship between a bastard and his natural parents, or either of them, for the purpose of those civil effects and consequences which result from the relation of a legitimate child to his parents. The bastard can take nothing from either of his natural parents by succession, or (otherwise than as a stranger in blood) by bequest; and it seems to be now admitted, even by those who have considered the bastard to be liable in law to maintain his mother, that he is not liable to maintain his putative father, though ascertained to the effect of making the putative father liable for the bastard's maintenance until able to maintain himself. It is not inconsistent with this general state of the law that both the natural parents should be liable while the bastard is in pupilage, and until he is able to maintain himself, to maintain the offspring which they have brought into existence; and it seems to me to be false reasoning to infer from this a reciprocal obligation upon the bastard after his state of pupilage and of incapacity to maintain himself has ceased.

The whole argument for the appellant depends upon the decision in Samson v. Davie. If both cases can stand together, that decision is no sufficient foundation for the argument. I must admit that such a state of law does appear to me to be arbitrary; for, if principle ought to be regarded, I should not find it easy to say that the bastard is to be recognised as a child for the purpose of imposing upon him an obligation to maintain his mother, but is not to be so recognised when the mother seeks a solatium for his death, in circumstances which would have given her a right of action if he had been legitimate. But if a principle is to be regarded, a state of law which imposes upon an emancipated bastard child the burden of maintaining his mother because he is her child, while it does not allow him to take from her by succession, or accept as a stranger in blood by bequest, seems to me also to be arbitrary; and in that view the present decision is the more, and that in Samson v. Davie the less, consistent with principle. If the two decisions cannot stand together, I prefer the present, as the more consistent with principle, and with the state of previous authority bearing upon the immediate question. As to the authorities on which Samson v. Davie was decided, I agree with the observations of my noble and learned friend Lord Watson, and do not think it necessary to add anything further. Quocunque modo, the interlocutors appealed from are right, in my judgment, and ought to be affirmed.

Husband and Wife—Foreign—Sale of English heritage belonging to wife—Surrogatum—Donation inter virum et uxorem.—The wife of a domiciled Scotsman, with her husband's concurrence, sold the estate of X, in England, belonging to her, and acknowledged the conveyance before two commissioners in terms of the Act 3 and 4 Will. IV. cap. 74, for the Abolition of Fines and Recoveries, declaring at the same time that she intended to give up her interest in the estate without having any provision made for her in lieu thereof. Her husband received the price and applied it to his own uses. The spouses afterwards separated by mutual consent, and the wife executed a deed of revocation of all donations and provisions made by her in her husband's favour. She then brought an action against him for declarator that the price in his hands was either (1) a surrogatum for her heritage, and not subject to the jus mariti, or (2) was a donation to him which she had validly revoked.

Held (rev. judgment of First Division) that by the law of England the husband on his marriage acquired an estate in his wife's heritage, so that at the date of the sale the estate of X was the heritable estate of the husband as well as of the wife, and that the price could not be regarded as a surrogatum for her estate solely.

Opinion that the wife's consent to her husband receiving the price could not be regarded as a donation by her in respect that the sale could not have been carried through without the husband's consent, and that his consent was only given on these terms.

Ld. Herschell. Lord Watson. Lord Morris.

(IN the Court of Session, June 28, 1889, 16 R. 876.)
The defender appealed.
After consideration,—

LORD HERSCHELL.—The parties were married in the year 1877 without any marriage-contract, and the domicile of the husband being Scottish, it was not disputed that this was the matrimonial domicile, and that all questions as to the right to moveables accruing to either of the spouses fall to be determined according to the law of Scotland.

The respondent was at the time of her marriage the owner of a freehold estate in England called Overton. She was also possessed of a leasehold house situated there. These freehold and leasehold properties were both sold shortly after the marriage. The £950 was the purchase money of the leasehold house, and as the claim in respect of it was abandoned it need not be further referred to. The £18,000 was part of the price of the freehold estate which was received by the husband on the execution of the conveyance in July 1877. The balance of the purchase money, £5500, was invested as security for the payment of an annuity of £200 a-year which was charged on the estate. It is not questioned that the £18,000 was received by the husband with the full assent of his wife, but the circumstances under which it was received and the precise nature of the transaction will be hereafter considered. Mrs Tennent, on the 28th of December 1882, revoked all donations in favour of her husband, and this action was afterwards commenced.

* Lord Morris adopted the opinion of Lord Ordinary (Kinnear), reported 17 R. p. 1061.

There can be no doubt, as I have said, that the rights of the spouses as regards moveable property must, in the circumstances of this case, be regulated by the law of Scotland, but it is equally clear that their rights in relation to heritable estate are governed by the law of the place where it was situate. This is not denied by the respondent, but it is said that as soon as the heritable estate in England became by sale converted into moveables the Scottish law became applicable. The case of the pursuer was put in this way. It was admitted that all moveables accrued by the law of Scotland to the husband by virtue of the jus mariti, but it was said that there is an exception to this in the case of the proceeds of the heritable estate of the wife, that they do not pass to the husband but remain the property of the wife, and that if she permits her husband to receive and spend them, this is in the nature of a donation which may be at any time recalled by her. It follows, it was argued, that as soon as the estate in England was sold, the proceeds, though they would according to the law of England be the husband's, became subject to the law of Scotland, and so did not pass to him. It is, I think, established that moveables which represent the heritable estate of the wife are not by the law of Scotland subject to the jus mariti, and where the matrimonial rights are governed by that law, I think this would be the case, even though the heritable estate of the wife were situate out of Scotland. But it is manifest that the lex loci rei sitæ must determine whether the estate be heritable estate of the wife's during coverture, and what is the nature and extent of her right in respect thereof. It becomes necessary, therefore, to inquire what was the effect of the marriage according to the law of England upon the heritable estate of which the wife was then possessed. The husband became immediately possessed of an estate therein during their joint lives, and if there was issue of the marriage, for the term of his own life, though he survived his wife. The wife could not during her husband's lifetime convey her interest in the property to any other person except with the concurrence of the husband, and by a deed acknowledged in the manner prescribed by the 3 and 4 Will. IV. c. 74. She could not during coverture dispose of it by will, and if she predeceased her husband, and there were issue of the marriage, the estate would on the death of the husband descend to such issue.

It is therefore, in my opinion, not accurate to treat the purchase money of the Overton estate as the proceeds of a heritable estate belonging to the wife, and as surrogatum for that estate. It was an estate in which both spouses possessed undetermined interests, the extent of their respective interests depending on whether there was issue of the marriage, and which of them survived the other. It was heritable estate of the husband as well as of the wife, and could not be disposed of to a purchaser without the concurrence of both of them. The purchase money of the estate in which they were thus interested cannot, in my opinion, truly be regarded as the price of a heritable estate of the wife's, which, according to the law of England, becomes the husband's only by the jus mariti, and which, if the law of Scotland be applicable, must be regarded, if the wife permits her husband to retain it, as a donation by her to him. The right of the husband to the proceeds does not flow only from the jus mariti. It cannot be dissociated from the real property law of this country, which gave the husband the estate and interest which I have described in the heritable property possessed by his wife at the time of the marriage. The price received from the purchaser represents as much the husband's estate and interest as the wife's. The wife, it is true, was by the sale deprived of the interest which she had in the heritable property, but I do not think that her assent to the entire price being received by her husband, without that provision being made for her which she could have insisted on as the price of her concurrence in the conveyance, can be regarded as a donation. There could have been no sale without the concurrence of the husband, and if he gives that concurrence on the terms that the whole purchase money of the estate in which they both have an interest shall be received by him, I do not think that this can be regarded as a donation of all the purchase money, or even of so much of it as might be found on an actuarial calculation to represent her interest, especially where, as in the present instance, the husband has, in order to complete the sales, entered by the deed of conveyance into an onerous covenant by reason of the charge which existed on the property. But it is perhaps hardly necessary to determine whether the purchase money could be regarded as a donation by the wife to the husband to the extent to which it represented her interest as ascertained on an actuarial calculation, inasmuch as the claim in this action is not to have it ascertained how much of the purchase money received in 1877 represented the interest of the wife in the heritable subject, and to treat so much of the purchase money as should be found to represent that interest as a donation inter virum et uxorem, but to treat the entire price of the estate as surrogatum for the heritable estate of the pursuer.

Welch v. Tennent.

For the reasons I have given, I think it is impossible to do so, even allowing the fullest effect to the Scottish law as regulating the matrimonial rights of the parties. I think the difference between the view I have indicated and that of the Court below has probably arisen from the circumstance that the contention mainly urged upon them on behalf of the appellant appears to have been that the purchase money, according to the law of England, became the husband's upon the conveyance; and that their attention was not so definitely directed as your Lordships' has been to the fact that, having regard to the English law of real property, the price could not properly be regarded as representing the heritable estate of the wife, and as surrogatum. Therefore, I am of opinion that the interlocutors appealed from ought to be reversed, and the defender assoilzied from the conclusions of the summons, and I move your Lordships accordingly.

Lord Watson and Lord Morris concurred.

Interlocutors appealed from reversed, and cause remitted to the First Division with directions to assoilzie the defender (appellant) from the conclusions of the summons.

in the Sheriff Court were concerned, on the ground that under section 22 of the Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864, it was incompetent to award them in that Court, there being no authority for the awarding of expenses in the special Act under which the prosecution was brought, viz., the Cruelty to Animals (Scotland) Act, 1850.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Answer the question in the case in the negative: Dismiss the appeal: Affirm the determination of the inferior Judge, and appoint parties to be heard on the question of expenses."

On 8th June 1891, at the hearing on the question of expenses, it was argued for the respondent;—It was competent to award expenses here. The provision in section 8 of the Cruelty to Animals (Scotland) Act, 1850, implied a power to award expenses against the accused. It had been held that that involved authority to award expenses against the prosecutor.[1]

Argued for the appellant;—There was no power expressly conferred by the Act of 1850 to award expenses. The power could not be inferred by implication from the terms of section 8 of the Act.[2]

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It seems perfectly clear from previous decisions that where an Act of Parliament authorises costs to be given against the accused it is implied that the Court has a general power of awarding costs to either party, in this view, that the power to award costs against the accused being given, it is an equitable and fair inference that the prosecutor may have expenses awarded against him if he fails in his prosecution.

Here the objection to the awarding of expenses is laid upon the 22d section of the Act of 1864, which provides that the award of expenses must be authorised by the special Act under which the prosecution is brought. The Act of Parliament with which we are dealing does not in express words say that expenses can be awarded either to or against the prosecutor. But it does say that if the penalty together with the costs are not paid, the Judge has the power to order imprisonment.

That seems to me very clearly to indicate that an award of expenses may be given by the Judge in such a case against the accused, and if such an award may be given, then I think the case that was cited to us makes it plain that it is competent to award expenses against the prosecutor. That is sufficient for the decision of the question of competency. As regards the merits, it is scarcely contended that if expenses may be given this is not a suitable case for doing so. It was a test case for the purpose of establishing a rule following upon cases in which the verdict had been one of acquittal. It was very expensive to the accused who was selected to stand the test. I think this is a suitable case for awarding expenses.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I think, upon the only legitimate construction of the Cruelty to Animals Act, there is authority to the Judge in the inferior Court to award expenses against the accused. If so, it follows from the case of Walker that there is an equal authority to award expenses against the prosecutor.

No. 16. Hence, in my opinion, we should give expenses against the prosecutor in this case.

Mar. 13, 1891. Todrick v. Wilson.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree. I think on the question of competency the case of Walker is conclusive. The terms of the statute there and here are practically the same, and it being competent to award expenses, I have no hesitation in saying that the expenses should be given.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having resumed consideration of this case, and heard counsel on the question of expenses, find the respondent entitled to expenses, both in this Court and in the inferior Court."

JAMES MARKLAND, Complainer.—G. Watt.
HER MAJESTY'S ADVOCATE, Respondent.—D. Robertson, A.-D.

Procedure—Competency of leading evidence and convicting of common law offence where statutory offence charged—Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. c. 35), sec. 62.—The Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, sec. 62, enacts,—"Where any act set forth in an indictment as contrary to any Act of Parliament is also criminal at common law, or where the facts proved under such an indictment do not amount to a contravention of the statute, but do amount to a crime at common law, it shall be lawful to convict of the common law crime."

A person was charged with having, while an undischarged bankrupt, within the meaning of sec. 4 of the Bankruptcy Frauds and Disabilities Act, 1884, obtained credit exceeding £20 from a firm of bootmakers without informing them that he was an undischarged bankrupt, contrary to sec. 4 of said Act. The evidence having negatived the charge, the Sheriff-substitute allowed further evidence to be led of facts not mentioned in the indictment, with the result that a verdict was obtained against the accused of the common law offence of falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition, and the accused was sentenced to imprisonment.

The Court suspended the conviction and sentence, holding that section 62 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, did not entitle the prosecutor to lead evidence to prove any facts not libelled in the indictment, and thereafter convict of a common law offence which had not been charged in the indictment.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord Rutherfurd Clark. Lord Trayner. Justiciary Clerk.

JAMES MARKLAND, boot and shoemaker, Glasgow, brought a bill of suspension against Her Majesty's Advocate, craving suspension of a conviction and sentence by the Sheriff-substitute (Lees) of Lanarkshire, dated 21st March 1891.

The complainer averred;—(Stat. 1) "James Neill Hart, as procurator-fiscal for Lanarkshire, for the public interest, caused the complainer to be served with a charge of having, while an undischarged bankrupt, obtained credit for £30, 5s. 6d., in contravention of section 4 of 47 and 48 Victoria, cap. 16. On 10th March the complainer appeared at the pleading diet and pleaded not guilty, and on 21st March 1891 the complainer attended the Court and was tried on the said charge before Sheriff-substitute Lees and a jury." (Stat. 2) "The charge as contained in the indictment is as follows:—'That your estates having been sequestrated by the Sheriff of Lanarkshire on 9th August 1888, and you not having received your discharge, and being an undischarged bankrupt within the meaning of section 4 of the Bankruptcy Frauds and Disabilities Act, 1884, you did, on 24th September and 5th November 1890, in your premises 29 West Howard Street, Glasgow, obtain credit to the amount of £30, 5s. 6d. from J. Tedds & Son, wholesale boot and shoe manufacturers, Dryden Street, Leicester, without informing said firm that you were an undischarged bankrupt, contrary to said section 4 of said Act, and you have thereby incurred the penalties provided by the Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880, 43 and 44 Victoria, cap. 34, section 13.'" (Stat. 3) "The first witness examined was the said J. Tedds, who said that he had never given the complainer credit, and that the said £30, 5s. 6d. had been paid, but that his agent had not informed him of this at the time he instructed the present proceedings. The Sheriff thereupon, after consultation with the procurator-fiscal, stated to the jury that the charge against the complainer had broken down, as he never obtained credit, but the fiscal would proceed with his evidence, and it might turn out that some other crime might be proved. Counsel for the complainer objected to such a course on the ground that the complainer was not charged with any other crime, and that no acts were set forth in the indictment amounting to a crime at common law, and that he was only prepared to meet the charge in the indictment. The Sheriff-substitute, however, repelled the objection, and insisted on the evidence being led." (Stat. 4) "At the close of the evidence the procurator-fiscal asked for a conviction against the complainer, but did not state what crime he wished the jury to convict of. After counsel for the complainer had addressed the jury the Sheriff-substitute asked the fiscal to state the charge on which he sought a conviction, and to put it in writing. The Sheriff and fiscal then adjusted a formal charge, which the Sheriff read to the jury in charging them. It was pointed out to the Sheriff, while he was adjusting the charge, the anomaly of a man being charged with a crime which neither he nor his counsel nor the Court knew the nature of till after his counsel's address to the jury. The Sheriff, however, proceeded with his charge, and the jury returned a verdict of guilty by a majority. The jury did not know what they were convicting the prisoner of, but the clerk of Court, reading from a paper handed to him by the Sheriff, read out to the jury,—'The jury by a majority found the panel guilty of having, on 24th September and 5th November, in the premises of J. Tedds & Son, wholesale boot and shoe manufacturers, Dryden Street, Leicester, and in his premises, 29 West Howard Street, pretended that he was J. Richmond, carrying on business at Coatbridge, and thus induced them to send him goods to the amount of £30, 5s. 6d., which he received and appropriated to his own uses in West Howard Street aforesaid.' The foreman of the jury assented by a nod, and the Sheriff-substitute then sentenced the complainer to forty days' imprisonment. He was immediately sent to prison to undergo the sentence."

The averments were admitted to be substantially correct.

The complainer pleaded;—(1) The charge under which the complainer was tried having been withdrawn from the jury by the Sheriff-substitute, he was entitled to be acquitted. (2) The complainer having been convicted of a pretended offence, with which he had never been charged, the conviction and sentence ought to be suspended. (3) The complainer never having been informed of the nature of the charge of which he was convicted till after the evidence was led and his counsel's address finished, the conviction and sentence are illegal, unjust, and oppressive, and ought to be suspended. (4) There being no acts set forth in the indictment criminal at common law, and the charge under the statute having been withdrawn or departed from, the conviction and sentence were illegal, and ought to be suspended.

Argued for the complainer;—The indictment charged the accused with a statutory offence only, and the species facti did not amount to an offence at common law. It was therefore incompetent to lead evidence in support of the latter charge, and the conviction of an offence at common law fell to be quashed.

Argued for the respondent;—Under the 62d section of the Act of 1887 it was competent, where a statutory offence was charged, to convict of an offence at common law if facts were proved, as they were here, amounting to such an offence.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The complainer was brought before the Sheriff of Lanarkshire and a jury on a charge of having contravened the Statute 47 and 48 Vict. c. 16, sec. 4, in respect that he being an undischarged bankrupt obtained credit to the amount of £30, 5s. 6d. from certain people in Leicester without informing them that he was an undischarged bankrupt. That was a statutory charge of a distinct kind, and a charge which on the face of it set forth no crime at common law at all. The first part of section 62 of the Criminal Procedure Act does not therefore apply. It appears that when the prosecutor had attempted to prove that the prisoner had obtained credit the evidence disclosed that this was not the case, and accordingly the prosecutor's case on the statutory charge completely broke down.

Whether it would have been right or not at once to have stopped the proceedings I do not say, but the Sheriff-substitute allowed the case to go on, and that was a competent course. Certain facts were brought out, and I shall assume that they were proved, viz., that the accused "pretended that he was J. Richmond, carrying on business at Coatbridge, and thus induced a firm" to send him goods to the amount of £30, 5s. 6d., which he received and appropriated to "his own uses in West Howard Street aforesaid." The jury returned a verdict accordingly.

That verdict found facts which there was nothing whatever in the indictment to cover. The Sheriff thought that a conviction might be good under the second part of section 62, which is as follows—"Where the facts proved under such an indictment do not amount to a contravention of the statute but do amount to a crime at common law, it shall be lawful to convict of the common law crime." ("Such an indictment" I take to mean an indictment charging a statutory crime.) I have no doubt that these words mean this—"the facts proved under such an indictment being facts charged in the narrative of the indictment." But I do not hold that these words amount to this, that if it should crop out in the evidence that some other crime might have been charged than the crime stated in the indictment, then it is competent to convict the accused of that other crime.

The indictment under a statute may set forth what is a crime at common law, not being exactly the same crime as the statute intends to strike at, and if it does, and if the evidence competently led proves that crime, conviction may follow.

But here there was no power whatever to receive evidence which would prove falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition under this indictment. The indictment set forth a statutory offence only, and the words in which it did so do not constitute any crime at common law. Therefore this conviction is bad, and must be set aside.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am of the same opinion, and I put my judgment on these grounds. I think the prosecutor was not entitled to lead evidence upon any facts that were not charged in the indictment. I think that he has led evidence of facts not charged in the indictment, and has obtained his conviction in respect of the facts so proved. The appellant has therefore been convicted of an offence which was not charged in the indictment and could not be proved under the indictment; therefore I am of opinion that the conviction should be set aside.

LORD TRAYNER.—In this case the prosecutor charged the suspender with an offence under the Bankruptcy Act, 1884 (47 and 48 Vict. cap. 16), sec. 4. It appears from the statement made by the suspender and admitted by the prosecutor that the evidence negatived the charge made in the indictment. The Sheriff-substitute seems to have thought that under section 62 of the Criminal Procedure Act 1887, the prosecutor was entitled to go on and prove some other offence than that libelled, with the result that a verdict was obtained which purports to find the suspender guilty of falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition.

I concur with both your Lordships in thinking that that conviction cannot stand. I agree with the view expressed by your Lordship in the chair as to the meaning of section 62. If an indictment charges a prisoner with a statutory offence, the species facti being also sufficient to constitute an offence at common law, the accused may on such an indictment be convicted of the offence at common law. But to allow a prosecutor to prove facts not charged is I think quite unwarrantable, and wholly improper. But in any view the verdict before us convicts the prisoner of what is not a crime at all. The verdict does not negative the idea of perfect honesty on the part of the accused, and I am clearly of opinion that this suspension should be sustained.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I entirely concur with Lord Trayner on the latter point. The case of H.M. Advocate v. Swan, Dec. 10, 1888, 2 White, 137, 16 R. (Just. Cases) 34, settled that it is not enough to aver in a common law charge that the person charged obtained credit to a certain amount, without specifying how or for what.

THE COURT suspended the conviction and sentence simpliciter.

JAMES PROVAN, doctor of medicine, residing in the burgh of Govan, was charged at the instance of James M. Malloch, procurator-fiscal of the burgh, with having contravened the Infectious Disease (Notification) Act, 1889, sec. 3, subsec. 1 (b), thereof,* in so far "as (first) he being the medical practitioner attending on David Milne, residing in Brand Street, in said burgh, and having on 10th February 1891 become aware that the said David Milne was suffering from scarlet fever, being an infectious disease to which the said Act applies, did fail thereupon to send to the medical officer of health of said burgh a certificate stating the name of the patient, the situation of the building, and the infectious disease from which, in his opinion, the patient was suffering; and (second) he, the said James Provan, being the medical practitioner attending on David Dowie, residing in M'Lellan Street, in said burgh, and having on 18th February 1891 become aware that the said David Dowie was suffering from typhoid fever, being an infectious disease to which the said Act applies, did fail thereupon to send to the medical officer of health of said burgh the name of the patient, the situation of the building, and the infectious disease from which, in his opinion, the patient last mentioned was suffering."

The complaint was brought under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 to 1881.

The accused was convicted and sentenced to pay a fine of 10s. 6d.

He brought a bill of suspension, in which he averred that he was unable on 10th and 18th February 1891, or on several subsequent visits, to diagnose the diseases from which the patients were suffering. He could not be aware at that early stage that the diseases were infectious. As soon as he was of opinion that they were suffering from diseases of an infectious nature he sent certificates to that effect to Dr Barras, the medical officer of the burgh, in terms of the Act.

The complainer further averred;—"(10) Apart from medical testimony, of which none was adduced, the certificates sent by the complainer to Dr Barras, the medical officer, formed (first) the only competent evidence that the complainer's patients ever had suffered from an infectious disease; and (second) they were an essential part of the evidence necessary to convict the complainer, assuming he was otherwise guilty, of not having sent statutory certificates before the dates they bear. Moreover, they exculpated the accused, since they bore that he had complied with the statutory requirement. These certificates were produced and spoken to by the sanitary inspector at the trial, but they were most improperly and illegally suppressed or omitted from the record."

The complainer pleaded;—1. The said sentence is illegal and unwarrantable, and ought to be suspended as craved in respect (2) The certificates sent by the complainer to the medical officer of the burgh, and produced by the witness Dunne, the sanitary inspector, were omitted from the record of the proceedings.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The terms of the 16th section of the Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864,* are in my opinion peremptory, and must be strictly complied with. Having pleaded guilty, he was fined £15 (which he paid) by Messrs William Geddes and George Manson, the presiding magistrates. Thereafter he left the country and went to America.

On 23d April Adam Shepherd, solicitor, Wick, applied to the Magistrates to state a case for appeal to the High Court of Justiciary under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals (Scotland) Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. c. 62), in respect, inter alia, that under the Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864 (27 and 28 Vict. c. 53), the penalty should not have exceeded £5. The Magistrates refused the application, upon the ground that Shepherd declined to produce a mandate from Williamson, who was outwith the jurisdiction of the Supreme Courts of Scotland.

Complaint—Specification—Objection not taken at trial.—A person was charged with "an offence within the meaning of the General Police and Improvement Act, 1862." There was no specification of the section said to have been contravened, but the acts said to have constituted the contravention were set forth. The accused stated no objection to the complaint in respect of want of specification, and was convicted. In a suspension, the Court, on the ground of want of specification, set aside the conviction, holding that it was incumbent on the prosecutor to set forth the section said to have been contravened as well as the acts said to constitute the contravention.

Hastings v. Charles, 2 White, 325, *followed.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Young.
Lord Rutherfurd Clark.
Lord Trayner.
Justiciary Clerk.

HELEN RUTHERFORD OR WHYTE was charged in the Burgh Court, Queensferry, with "an offence within the meaning of the General Police and Improvement Act, 1862." The complaint stated that on 16th April 1891, "she did, in an unoccupied dwelling-house situated at East Terrace, burgh of Queensferry, said house being her property, wholly in her possession, and under her control, wilfully or negligently permit a water tap or cock attached to or forming part of the water-pipe in said house to remain open, whereby the water supplied by the Commissioners of Police of said burgh for domestic and ordinary purposes, or under their control, was wasted, whereby the said Helen Rutherford Whyte is liable to a penalty not exceeding £5."

Mrs Whyte was represented by an agent, who stated objections to the relevancy, which were repelled. No objection to the effect that the section founded on ought to have been set forth was stated. She was convicted on evidence "of the contravention charged, in so far as the said Helen Rutherford Whyte did negligently permit waste of the water libelled," and was fined 5s.

Mrs Whyte raised a suspension of the proceedings, in which she pleaded, inter alia;—1. The conviction in question ought to be suspended, in respect (1) that the complaint was not sufficiently specific to be relevant under the statute libelled, or at common law; and (2) that the facts charged did not amount to a contravention of said statute.

Argued for the complainer;—The complaint was irrelevant for want of

* HASTINGS AND OTHERS v. CHARLES, Oct. 29, 1892, 2 White, 325.

In this case Hastings and others, a number of sailors, were charged in a complaint brought under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, 1864-1881, and the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, that they being "all employed and lawfully engaged as seamen within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, . . . on board the said steamship 'Tay,' did, on 4th June 1889, at Borrowstounness, . . . neglect or refuse, without reasonable cause, to proceed to sea in said ship, . . . and this the said . . . did contrary to the Merchant Shipping Acts, 1854 to 1887, whereby the said . . . are each liable, in terms of the Merchant Shipping Acts, 1854 to 1887, to forfeit out of their wages," &c.

After evidence led the accused were convicted and appealed to the High Court, the question of law for the opinion of the Court being, "Whether the complaint was sufficiently specific to be relevant under the statutes or at common law?"

The Court held that the indictment was irrelevant, in respect it failed to set forth the section of the Merchant Shipping Acts, 1854 to 1887, alleged to have been contravened, and that the accused had therefore no sufficient notice of the offence to be proved against them.

No. 20.

Whyte v. Robertson.

specification. The Act said to have been contravened was one of 449 sections. The section which applied to the case was probably the 226th, which was a section incorporating with the Act the Water-Works Clauses Act, 1847, "with respect to the following matters," and, inter alia, "with respect to waste or misuse of water supplied by the undertakers." That Act, sec. 55 and sec. 60, made certain provisions as to waste or misuse of water. But, even assuming it to be unnecessary to go outside the Act of 1862 itself, the section of that Act said to have been contravened ought to have been quoted.[1]

Argued for the respondent;—This objection came too late.[2] Though objections were stated to the relevancy, this was not one of them. The case of Hastings was explained by the special circumstances of the charge. Here facts amounting to a good charge were specified. The reference to the statute was quite sufficient.[3] The Summary Procedure Act, 1864,[4] made it necessary only to set forth "the Act or section of the Act founded on without setting forth the enactment in words at length." The section plainly intended was sec. 223.*

LORD YOUNG.—It is certainly a general rule of law that an objection to a complaint which might have been stated before the case went to proof shall not be allowed to be stated after verdict. But that rule, though general, is not universal.

The objection which we are considering is, that the prosecutor did not properly frame his complaint, when he gave the accused a mere reference to an Act containing 400 to 500 sections, and which she is said to have contravened, while that Act itself in sec. 226 contains a reference importing into it another statute having also very numerous sections. It was that section that the suspender's counsel said that he supposed the prosecutor to have in view.

When we were referred to the section which the respondent's counsel quoted from the Police Act, 1862 (section 223), we found it to provide against violent and fraudulent interference with a water company's works, and against wilful or negligent waste of water with which the person said to cause the waste is supplied by the water company. But there is nothing in the complaint to lead the accused to refer to that particular clause, or to lead her to that part of the clause which she is now said to have contravened, and which is said to have been intended in the complaint. And even that section, as I have just said, embraces a variety of different acts. The particular part of it to which we were referred is, that whosoever "shall wilfully or negligently waste, or cause to be wasted, any water with which he is supplied by the commissioners." Now, I think that the provision founded on ought to have been set out, not by quotation, but by a reference to the section and by a specification of the acts said to have constituted the contravention. In that opinion I am following the case of Hastings, which was cited to us, and with which I agree.

Now, there was nothing in the complaint of the nature I have described. Indeed, we have no assurance that the magistrates took the right view of the statute at all. They may have thought that the appellant was acting in contravention of the section even though no water was being supplied at the time. If they did so, their construction was quite erroneous, but they may have so held, because I understood the respondent's counsel to maintain that if the water was turned on to this unoccupied house, and there was in it at the time a cock not properly turned off, there was a contravention. I think that quite wrong. That doubt would certainly have been avoided if the rule laid down in the case of Hastings had been followed.

On these grounds I consider that the conviction cannot be maintained.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I was a party to the decision in the case of Hastings, and I think it is in point.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree with all that has been said by your Lordship in the chair. I think that the case of Hastings laid down a sound and valuable rule, and that prosecutors in the inferior Courts ought to understand that if they desire to state a complaint charging a statutory offence, they must set forth the statute and the section said to have been contravened as well as specify the facts said to form the contravention.

THE COURT suspended the conviction.

Poaching Prevention Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 114), sec. 2—Poaching inferred from possession of poaching implements and game.—Held that in order to justify a conviction under section 2 of the Poaching Prevention Act, 1862,* it was not essential that the person in whose possession poaching implements and game are found should have been seen upon land in search of game or coming from land, but that the Sheriff or Justices are entitled to draw that inference from the possession of the poaching implements and game, and other facts in the case.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord Adam. Lord Rutherfurd Clark. Justiciary Clerk.

ROBERT LOCKHART and John M'Ewan, Pollokshaws, were charged at the instance of Murdoch M'Kenzie, sergeant of police in the Renfrewshire Constabulary, in the Sheriff Court at Paisley with a contravention of section 2 of the Act 25 and 26 Vict. c. 114, "in so far as on or about the 22d day of July 1890 the said Robert Lockhart and John M'Ewan were found by the complainer on, upon, or about the junction of the public streets . . . within the town of Pollokshaws, . . . known by the appellations of New Street and Coustonhill Street, coming from land

On 5th August 1890 the Hon. Sheriff-substitute (M'Gown) found the complaint not proved, and dismissed the panels from the bar simpliciter.

M'Kenzie asked a case, in which the Sheriff-substitute stated the following facts as proved:—

About five o'clock on Tuesday morning, 22d July, the appellant and another constable observed the respondents at the junction of New Street and Coustonhill Street, Pollokshaws. They were known to the constables, who observing them having something bulky in their possession apprehended them and took them to the police-office at Pollokshaws. On being searched there two nets, of the respective lengths of forty-nine and forty-one yards, and a trail string, sixty-nine yards long, suitable for the purpose of taking game, and contained in a small handbag, were found upon Lockhart. M'Ewan had in his possession a gentleman's leather bag containing seven wild rabbits, warm, recently killed and gutted. The nets and trail were wet and had fresh grass upon them, shewing they had been lately used. The town of Pollokshaws was adjacent to the policy-grounds of Sir John Stirling-Maxwell, Bart., and others, on all of which game was preserved and abounded.

The Sheriff-substitute further stated his ground of judgment in the following terms:—"I held that as the respondents had not actually been seen upon land, or coming from land, they should be acquitted, and in consonance with that view the respondents were discharged."

The question of law for the opinion of the Court was, whether under the provisions of the Poaching Prevention Act of 1862, when facts and circumstances as above were proved, it was necessary to shew that the respondents had actually been seen upon land or coming from land.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The Act which we have to consider prescribes that any person who is suspected of having been on land for the purpose of poaching may be stopped and searched. If anything usually used in poaching, or any fruits the results of poaching are found in his possession, these may be taken possession of by the officer, who may then raise a complaint for the purpose of obtaining a conviction against such person for poaching, either by being himself upon any land or by being an accessory. The facts stated in this case plainly implied a contravention of the statute. But then the Sheriff-substitute had a doubt whether, although these facts were proved, any person could be convicted who was not seen on land or coming from land, and decided that he must acquit because of want of evidence of this. I think he took an entirely erroneous view, and I have no hesitation in answering the question of law put to us in the negative.

M'Kenzie v. Lockhart.

LORD ADAM.—This Act provides for two things,—(1) searching, (2) conviction. It provides that it shall be lawful for a constable to search any person whom he may have good cause to suspect of coming from any land where he shall have been in unlawful pursuit of game. The constable under this first part of the section searched the respondents. To that there is no objection. The respondents were found to be carrying nets and other appliances for poaching, and to be in possession of rabbits recently killed. That shewed without any doubt where they had been. That being so, the next thing the statute says is, —"If such person shall have obtained such game by unlawfully going on any land in search or pursuit of game, or shall have used any such article or thing as aforesaid for unlawfully killing or taking game, or shall have been accessory thereto, such person shall on being convicted," &c. There is nothing either about being seen upon land or coming from land. I cannot possibly answer the question otherwise than in the negative.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am of the same opinion. The Sheriff thought he was not entitled to draw the inference that the respondents had been unlawfully in pursuit of game from their being in possession of nets and of rabbits recently killed. He thought that in order to justify conviction there must be proof that the persons were seen on the lands in pursuit of game or coming from the lands. I am of opinion that he was wrong, and that we should sustain the appeal and answer the question in the negative.

THE COURT answered the question of law in the negative, and found that the Sheriff ought to have convicted the respondents.

Before he had signed articles for the voyage, an attempt was made to induce him to leave the vessel by a delegate of a Seamen's Union.

The delegate on being convicted of an offence under section 257 * of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, appealed to the High Court of Justiciary on the ground that A was not a "seaman" within the meaning of section 2 of the Act, because he had not signed articles.

Held that A was a seaman in the sense of the Act, and appeal dismissed.

Thomson v. Hart.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-Clerk.
Lord Adam.
Lord Rutherfurd Clark.
Justiciary Clerk.

ARCHIBALD THOMSON, residing at Govan, was charged in the Sheriff Summary Court of Lanarkshire at Glasgow, at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal of Court, upon a complaint which set forth that he "did (1) on 5th June 1890, on board the s.s. 'Sarmatian' then lying at Plantation Quay, Glasgow Harbour, repeatedly request Alexander Kane, seaman, lawfully engaged on board said ship, to leave the same and not proceed to sea in her, and did threaten him with violence if he did not accede to his request, and did seize hold of the said Alexander Kane, and attempt to drag or force him out of the ship, and did thus attempt to persuade the said Alexander Kane to neglect or refuse to join or proceed to sea in their said ship, or otherwise to absent himself from his duty, contrary to the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, section 257."

Thomson was convicted of the charge and took a case, in which the following facts were stated by the Sheriff-substitute (Balfour) as proved:—The steamship "Sarmatian" one of the ships of the Allan Line, arrived in Glasgow Harbour on her return voyage from America on 2d June 1890, and Kane was employed as storekeeper of the vessel. On the day following her arrival, the crew, including Kane, were formally discharged, but Kane was immediately re-engaged verbally by the chief officer to sail with the ship on her next voyage, and also to remain by her while she lay in harbour, and to attend to his duties on board until she should again sail. Kane further undertook to sign the articles of agreement for next voyage whenever called upon to do so; and as a pledge that he would do so, he deposited his discharge in the hands of the chief officer, without which discharge it was impossible for him to obtain a berth in another ship. Kane afterwards carried out this engagement and undertaking.

It was Kane's duty to attend to the ship's stores, and it was necessary for him to be in constant attendance on board, to take charge of the stores, and serve them out when required, as well when the ship was in harbour as when at sea.

On 5th June, while Kane was engaged at his duties in the storeroom, the appellant, who had no business or right on board, came upon the ship and repeatedly ordered Kane to leave his ship and his duties, threatened him that if he would not go ashore he would put him ashore, swore at him, and put his hands upon him to shove him up the ladder. At this time, the crew for the next voyage were on board ship, in the act of signing the articles of agreement, in presence of the chief officer, and Kane signed the articles immediately after the appellant's attempt to induce him to leave the ship.

The appellant was a member and delegate of the Seamen's Union, of which Kane was not a member. When the "Sarmatian" had last sailed from Glasgow, a strike of those seamen who were members of the union was in progress. The strike terminated on the ship's return to Glasgow. Kane had joined her and sailed in her, although ordered by the union not to do so, and on 5th June the appellant, in his capacity as delegate of the union, was on board for the purpose of endeavouring to compel Kane to leave the ship.

The case further stated,—"The agent for the appellant objected that the section of the Act founded upon did not apply, and a conviction under that section was not competent against the appellant, in respect that at the time when the offences are said to have been committed Kane had not signed the ship's articles, and was not legally bound to sail with her. I held that as regards Kane he was, under the circumstances already detailed, engaged and acting as the regular storekeeper of the ship, and that he had duties to perform in the ship, not only while she was proceeding on a voyage, but while she was in harbour, and that, in point of fact, at the time of the offence, he was lawfully engaged in the discharge of his duties as storekeeper. . . . The objection therefore does not apply to that offence."

The question of law was, whether, in the circumstances before detailed, the appellant was legally convicted under the section of the Act founded on of the offence charged against him.

Argued for the appellant;—In order to be guilty of the offence of desertion under section 243 of the Act, it was essential that the seaman should have signed articles before his desertion. Kane had not done this, and accordingly no one could be guilty under section 257 of persuading him to commit that offence. The case of Austin v. Olsen[1] differed toto cœlo from the present. In it there was a valid subsisting agreement, and no evidence to contradict it. Here the only agreement to accept re-employment in the vessel was a verbal one.

Argued for the respondent;—The expression "seaman" included every person engaged on board a ship, whether he had signed articles or not. Articles were only required when the seaman proceeded to sea. An alleged informality in the seaman's engagement was not relevant as a defence in the mouth of the person who had induced him to break his engagement.[2]

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It seems to me that the conviction is right. The signing of articles is declared by the statute to be necessary where a master takes any seaman to sea. The interpretation clause says that "'seaman' shall include every person (except masters, pilots, and apprentices duly indentured and registered) employed or engaged in any capacity on board any ship." It is evident that there may be many persons so employed who do not require to go to sea at all. The clause therefore which relates to the signing of articles has not, I think, any bearing on this case. The whole question in this case was whether the man Kane was engaged in some capacity on board the ship, and whether while so engaged he was interfered with by the accused contrary to the statute. The Sheriff-substitute was satisfied of that upon the facts, and being so satisfied he was bound to convict.

LORD ADAM.—What the Sheriff found in point of fact was this,—"I held that as regards Kane he was, under the circumstances already detailed, engaged and acting as the regular storekeeper of the ship, and that he had duties to perform in the ship, not only while she was proceeding on a voyage, but while she was in harbour, and that in point of fact, at the time of the offence, he was lawfully engaged in the discharge of his duties as storekeeper." Section 257 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, imposes a penalty upon "every person who by any means whatever persuades or attempts to persuade any seaman or apprentice to neglect or refuse to join or to proceed to sea in or to desert from his ship, or otherwise to absent himself from his duty"; "seaman" meaning in this Act any person who is "engaged in any capacity on board any ship." That Kane was in the position of a seaman, and that the accused was endeavouring to persuade him to absent himself from his duty I have no doubt, and accordingly I have no hesitation in sustaining the conviction.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am of the same opinion. I think beyond all question that, according to the state of the facts as stated by the Sheriff, Kane was at the time of the occurrence in question a seaman on board the "Sarmatian," and that the appellant committed a breach of section 257 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854. I think it quite irrelevant to inquire whether Kane had or had not signed articles. I agree upon that matter with the views expressed by Mr Justice Mellor in the case of Austin v. Olsen.

JAMES JOHNSTON, Pursuer (Respondent).—Baxter.
JOHN YOUNG, Defender (Appellant).—M'Lennan.

Sheriff—Small-Debt Court—Review—Sequestration in security of rent of house—Warrant to search for and carry back furniture removed from house by tenant.—The tenant of a house who had paid his last half year's rent due at Martinmas 1889, and whose tenancy did not expire till Whitsunday 1890, in January 1890 removed his furniture to a house in another town. The landlord raised in the Small-Debt Court a summons of sequestration in security of the rent to become due, and on the margin of the summons he wrote a minute in which he craved warrant to carry back the furniture to his house, in respect the tenant "had removed to another house the whole of the goods in the house, and subject to the pursuer's right of hypothec for the rent thereof due" in three months' time. No notice of these proceedings was given to the tenant. The Sheriff granted warrant as craved, and a sheriff-officer proceeded to the tenant's new abode and brought back the furniture to the landlord's house.

The Court recalled the warrant, holding that the minute set forth no circumstances to justify the Sheriff in granting the warrant without notice to the defender.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord Adam. Lord Rutherfurd Clark. Justiciary Clerk.

IN January 1890 John Young, joiner, Leith, who was tenant of a house belonging to James Johnston, joiner, Leith, removed from the house to Greenock, where he had got work at better wages, taking with him his furniture. His tenancy did not expire till Whitsunday 1890, and he had paid the previous half year's rent due at Martinmas 1889.

On 1st February 1890 Johnston raised in the Sheriff Small-Debt Court at Leith a summons of sequestration against Young in security of the rent to become due at Whitsunday 1890.

On the margin of the summons the pursuer's agent wrote a minute, in which he stated that "in respect the defender, the within designed John Young, has removed the whole of the goods and effects which were in the house 10 Allan Street, and subject to the pursuer's right of hypothec for the rent thereof due at the term of Whitsunday 1890 to a house which he now occupies at 26 Blackhall Street, Greenock, and also" to certain other houses in Leith "warrant is respectfully craved to officers of Court to search for and carry back said goods and effects to the house No. 10 Allan Street aforesaid, there to be inventoried and sequestrated and secured in terms of the within warrant."

On 4th February the Sheriff-substitute (Hamilton) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having considered the minute for pursuer written upon the margin of the first page hereof, grants warrant as craved."

Upon this warrant a sheriff-officer proceeded to Greenock, seized all the defender's furniture there, and brought it back to No. 10 Allan Street, Leith, where he inventoried it.

No notice of the summons of sequestration was given to the defender until 19th February, when the summons with inventory was served upon the defender, the diet of compearance being 25th February, when, the rent not being due, the process was continued generally. Two days prior to Whitsunday the defender paid the half year's rent due at that term. Thereafter, without any intimation to the defender, the pursuer enrolled the case for 20th May, and took decree in absence for £3, 17s. 4d. of expenses, and warrant was also granted to sell for that sum. Notice of sale was given on 23d May, and thereupon the defender took out a sist of the decree, and consigned the full sum decerned for. On 29th July the Sheriff-substitute recalled the sist, and decerned for additional expenses incurred therein, and granted warrant to the Clerk of Court to pay the pursuer the whole of the consigned money, to be applied pro tanto in extinction of the sums decerned for.

Young appealed to the High Court of Justiciary, and argued;—(1) It was an act of oppression upon the part of the Sheriff-substitute to give the decrees complained of, in respect that the original summons and relative minute was not served upon or in any way intimated to the appellant. (2) There was no provision in the Small-Debt Acts empowering a Sheriff to grant warrant to sequestrate any goods or effects saving those upon or within the premises let. The warrant to carry back the appellant's furniture from Greenock was illegal.

Argued for the respondent;—It was unreasonable to expect to find in the Small-Debt Acts provision for every case. At common law such a warrant as was here complained of had been sustained,[1] and indeed it was the practice in Sheriff Courts to grant such warrants in such circumstances.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think it is quite unnecessary to decide here whether a person can obtain such a warrant as is here complained of without giving notice to his adversary or affording him an opportunity of being heard.

I am quite clear that if such an extraordinary warrant is to be obtained, it can only be by the Sheriff having something before him which he can consider as giving him good ground for granting it. Here the minute on the margin of the summons states nothing but the bare fact that the furniture has been removed to another house. That is not a statement upon which any Sheriff should consider himself justified in granting the warrant. Whether the respondent here could have stated more fully the grounds on which he desired to obtain the warrant we cannot tell. We have nothing before us except the proceedings in the Small-Debt Court, and they shew plainly that the warrant to bring back the appellant's furniture from Greenock to Leith was granted by the Sheriff-substitute without any facts before him for considering the case. I think it is our duty to alter his judgment.

LORD ADAM.—I concur. There is no ground set forth in the minute for granting the application without notice to the appellant. It is not said, as it was in M'Kechnie's case, that the goods were being removed "under cloud of night." In short, the warrant is one which ought only to be granted with great care, and after deliberation and a full statement of the circumstances which are said to make it necessary.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I, like your Lordship, am disposed to think it unnecessary to decide any general question, for I think we can decide this case on its own special circumstances. I do not say that in no circumstances should a warrant such as this be granted without notice to the opposite party, but I

Procedure—Complaint—Specification—Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. c. 58), sec. 49, rule 1.—A complaint in the Sheriff Court set forth that J. R. having, on 10th June 1890, been manager of a mine, and as manager having been responsible for the due observance in said mine of rule 1 of section 49 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887,* "did, time above libelled, fail to constantly produce an amount of ventilation . . . adequate to dilute," &c. (the words of the rule being quoted without further specification), "in consequence whereof an explosion . . . took place in said level, whereby" certain persons were injured, and this J. R. did contrary to the said Act, sec. 49, rule 1. The Sheriff, after a proof, convicted the accused. The Court quashed the conviction on the ground that the complaint upon which it proceeded did not state in what respect the system of ventilation in use in the mine was defective, and that it had been proved that the injuries sustained by the miners had not been caused by anything but their own fault.

JAMES ROBERTS, mine manager, Holmes, Uphall, was charged at the instance of John Boland Atkinson, Her Majesty's Inspector of Mines for the eastern district of Scotland, in respect that he, "having, on 10th June 1890, been manager at No. 2 mine, Holmes, Uphall parish, Linlithgowshire, occupied by the Holmes Oil Company, Limited, and as manager foresaid having been responsible for the due observance in said mine of the first rule contained in the 49th section of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, did time above libelled fail to constantly produce an amount of ventilation in said mine adequate to dilute and render harmless noxious gases to such an extent that the working-places in No. 6 level in said mine and the travelling roads to and from said working-places should be in a fit state for working and passing therein, in consequence whereof an explosion of fire-damp or some other noxious gas took place in said level, whereby Hugh Gavin, drawer, Goschen Place, Uphall parish, aforesaid, and others were severely burned in their person, and this the said James Roberts did, contrary to the Act 50 and 51 Vict. c. 58, sec. 49, rule 1."

* 50 and 51 Vict. c. 58, sec. 49, provides,—"The following general rules shall be observed so far as is reasonably practicable in every mine:—Rule 1. An adequate amount of ventilation shall be constantly produced in every mine to dilute and render harmless noxious gases to such an extent that the working-places of the shafts, levels, stables, and workings of the mine, and the travelling roads to and from these working-places shall be in a fit state for working and passing therein."

Section 50,—"Every person who contravenes or does not comply with any of the general rules in this Act shall be guilty of an offence against this Act; and in the event of any contravention of or noncompliance with any of the said general rules in the case of any mine to which this Act applies, by any person whomsoever, the owner, agent, and manager shall each be guilty of an offence against this Act, unless he proves that he had taken all reasonable means by publishing, and to the best of his power enforcing, the said rules as regulations for the working of the mine, to prevent such contravention or noncompliance."

No. 4.

Nov. 3, 1890.
Roberts v. Atkinson.

After evidence the Sheriff-substitute (Hog) convicted Roberts of the offence charged. In an appeal Roberts set forth the above proceedings, and the evidence was printed in an appendix.

Argued for Roberts;—The complaint was defective from want of specification. He was entitled to have had notice of the particular defect in the system of ventilation complained of.[1]

Argued for the respondent;—The duty imposed on the manager by the statute was the positive duty of providing an adequate amount of ventilation. Breach of it consisted in not doing enough to secure such ventilation. It was not then necessary to state specifically the alleged defect in the ventilation.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think the complaint here is defective in giving no statement whatever of the alleged defect in the system of ventilation, or more properly perhaps, of what was the thing in the system of ventilation which was alleged to be defective. It is plain that a case under this statute might be brought without an explosion having happened at all, but simply upon an opinion formed by the inspector of mines, or upon complaints by the miners. Now, if it were competent to charge that simply in the form in which it is charged here, it would put upon the accused a tremendous inquiry in regard, it might be, to a very large system of ventilation in a very large mine, and even although he could prove anything to exonerate himself under section 50, it is a great burden to put upon him to meet all conceivable points. It cannot be sufficient for an inspector, or any number of inspectors, to come forward and say,—"I do not consider the system to be sufficient." They must be able to substantiate that by shewing the particular failure committed. I therefore think some specification is necessary of what is the alleged fault in the system of ventilation.

I am further of opinion that the prosecutor undertook to prove as part of his case not only that there was a failure in ventilation, but that this failure caused an explosion which resulted in injury and death to certain miners, and the verdict being a general one of the offence charged, we are bound to assume that the Judge convicted the accused of the whole charge. I think it is clear upon the evidence that the injury to these men was not caused by anything but their own fault.

LORD WELLWOOD.—There are cases in which it is sufficient to echo the words of the statute which creates the offence, but I think in the present case it was necessary that some notice should have been given to the person accused of the particular defect of which the prosecutor complained. I think the complaint is defective in specification. The matter is made the more misleading by this, that in the complaint it is stated that as a consequence of the alleged failure of duty certain persons were injured. The attention of the accused was therefore more directed to disprove that consequence of the alleged failure, and it rather appears from the character of the evidence and the witnesses adduced that that was the matter which he came principally to meet.

The respondent evidently relied upon evidence of the explosion as proving the inadequacy of the system, but it is proved that the mode of ventilation was not the proximate cause of the explosion, which was due to the carelessness of the miners. I think no offence under the statute has been proved.

LORD KINCAIRNEY.—I am of the same opinion. I think in this case the objection to relevancy should be sustained. I think it would have been fair to have disclosed the precise nature of the defect in ventilation on which the in-Gaming—"Swindler"—Aberdeen Police and Waterworks Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. cciii.), sec. 240.—A person was charged upon a complaint, which set forth that he "being a swindler within the meaning of the 240th* section of the Aberdeen Police and Waterworks Act, 1862, was found in a public street exhibiting a wheel of fortune or some similar implement for the purpose of inducing, and did induce and entice persons to play at a game of hazard." It was proved that the accused had exhibited a wheel of fortune at which eight persons simultaneously staked a penny each, the winner receiving fivepence, and the accused retaining threepence from the stakes as he had previously intimated. The magistrate convicted the accused.

In an appeal, held that as there was no evidence that the accused was a swindler the conviction could not be sustained.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-Clerk.
Ld. Wellwood.
Lord Kincairney.
Justiciary Clerk.

JAMES MELVIN, Aberdeen, was charged at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal of the Police Court at Aberdeen with a contravention of the 240th section of the Aberdeen Police and Waterworks Act, 1862, in respect that "he being a swindler within the meaning of that enactment was, on 12th July 1890, found in Castle Street, Aberdeen, exhibiting a wheel of fortune or some similar implement, for the purpose of inducing, and did induce and entice persons to play at a game of hazard." Melvin pleaded not guilty.

Evidence having been led in support of the complaint it was proved that on the evening of the date libelled (12th July 1890) the appellant was in Castle Street surrounded by a crowd of people. On a table in front of him there was placed a revolving wheel to the circumference of which there were attached, at regular intervals, eight cards, placed upright, and numbered consecutively 1 to 8. Upon the table, close to the rim of the wheel, a small red flag was placed. He had also eight separate cards bearing the same numbers as those on the wheel, and which he invited the public to purchase at the price of 1d. each. When he had sold the whole of the eight cards the wheel was set in motion, and the card nearest the flag when the wheel stopped was declared the winning number. The person holding the winning card then received 5d. from the appellant, who himself retained the 3d. The appellant intimated to the crowd, when selling the cards at a 1d., that the winner would receive 5d., and that he (the appellant) would retain the 3d. After playing for some time the appellant raised the price of the cards to 2d each, giving the winner 10d. and retaining the 6d. to himself—after having intimated these conditions.

It was not proved that the appellant was a convicted or habit and repute swindler.

The magistrate convicted Melvin.

Melvin appealed to the High Court, and the above facts are taken from the statement in the case.

Argued for appellant;—It was of the essence of the charge here that the accused was a "swindler." There was no definition of a "swindler" in the enactment upon which the complaint proceeded, and it was difficult to see how the fact that the appellant took a small percentage of the winnings for the use of his wheel of fortune could entitle the prosecutor to call him a swindler in the ordinary acceptation of that term.[1] Further, it was stated in the case that it was not proved that the accused was a convicted or habit and repute swindler.

Argued for the respondent;—On a sound construction of the Act actual proof of "swindling" was not necessary. A person came within the statutory words of the section if he exhibited implements to induce the public to play at hazard. Possession of those implements presumed possession for swindling purposes. As regarded the clause dealing with "one who by any fraudulent act or device cozens and cheats," it would be clearly superfluous to prove that the accused was a swindler, for the acts were criminal in themselves.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I should be sorry if any decision of this Court should prevent the Magistrates of Aberdeen or any other town putting down the playing of games of hazard in public places. The question, however, which we have to decide is, whether this prosecution under the 240th section of the Aberdeen Police and Waterworks Act, 1862, ought to have been followed by a conviction upon the facts stated. The case turns entirely upon the interpretation to be given to that section. The section begins with the statement of the persons who may be prosecuted under it. They are—"Every chaindropper, thimbler, loaded dice player, and other swindler of that or any similar description."

The three things which are specified are well-known means of swindling in public places, means which the law has long used the utmost efforts to put down. "Other swindler" I take to apply to modes of cheating of a similar kind to those specified. The essential characteristic of the person specified in the clause is, that he must be a cheat or swindler. Where such a person is found in possession of implements for practising games of hazard he is liable to punishment. The reason for such an enactment plainly is, that where the person found in possession of such articles is a swindler, there is a presumption that he has them in his possession for swindling purposes. The second thing struck at by the statute is—"Or who exhibits such implements or articles in order to induce or entice or who induces or entices any person to play at any game of hazard"—again the presumption is that he will swindle the public. Then, lastly, the section goes on to say—"Or who by any fraudulent act or device cozens and cheats, or attempts to cozen and cheat any person"—that plainly is intended to cover such acts as may be invented by such swindlers of a similar class to those described in the first part of the section. It was suggested in argument that in the case of the last offence it would be superfluous to prove that the person accused was a swindler, as the acts mentioned are in themselves criminal by whomsoever they may be committed. But it must be kept in view that it may be very convenient to have a means of prosecuting such an offence under a local Act; and further, that the fact that the accused is a swindler may throw light upon his actions, and under this section such evidence of character would be admissible while it might not be so at common law. The clause is, I think, consistent with itself throughout. Its object and intention is to deal with these persons who are shewn to be swindlers, for the purpose of preventing them carrying out their schemes. The prosecutor apparently took the same view, for he has made the fact that the accused is a "swindler" a substantive part of the complaint. He has undertaken to prove it, and I think he was bound to undertake that to make the charge relevant. But, in any event, he has made it a part of his case.

Now, the statement of facts in the case makes it plain that there was nothing in the evidence to indicate that the appellant was a swindler in any sense of the word. It is expressly stated that it was not proved that he was a convicted and habit and repute swindler. Further, the description given of the game played made it impossible that in the playing of that game he could swindle at all. I think the conviction cannot stand.

LORD WELLWOOD.—I agree. Your Lordship has anticipated all I had to say on the terms of the section and complaint, which I think acknowledges that it is of the essence of the charge that the accused person is a swindler. Now, I think that fact might be inferred either from the implements found in the possession of the accused,—for example, loaded dice,—or from the game played. In this case we are told very plainly what the accused did with the implements in his possession, and while he induced persons to play at a game of hazard, and made a substantial profit, there is no statement of any attempt to swindle the public. It is stated that he announced his terms, and that the persons playing were quite aware of them. It is further stated that there was no evidence of previous conviction, or of the accused being habit and repute a swindler. I think therefore that the prosecutor has failed to make out the charge he has stated.

LORD KINCAIRNEY.—I concur. If it were enough to say that this man induced the public to gamble, we would have required to sustain the conviction. But the statute requires it to be shewn that he is or was a swindler. I think it is clear he was not a swindler. I think that there cannot be a swindle without fraud or falsehood, express or implied, concealed or overt. There was here no misrepresentation and no deceit.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustain the appeal, reverse the determination of the inferior Judge, and decern."

regulating the conduct of the owners, masters, and crews of vessels propelled by steam with regard to the rate of speed at which they may proceed within the port and harbours."

The Harbour, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, sec. 83, provides that harbour trustees may make bye-laws for the purpose of "preventing damage or injury to any vessel or goods within the harbour or dock, or at or near the pier."

Greenock Harbour Trustees made a bye-law purporting to regulate the speed of vessels in the fairway of the navigable channel of the River Clyde ex adverso of the harbour works.

Held that as the fairway of the navigable channel of the River Clyde ex adverso of the harbour works was not within the harbour, the bye-law was ultra vires of the trustees.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord Adam. Lord Rutherfurd Clark. Justiciary Clerk.

JOHN KERR, mate of the steamship "Eleanore," presented a bill of suspension against James Auld, Procurator-fiscal of the burgh of Greenock, craving suspension of a conviction in the Police Court at Greenock upon a complaint charging the complainer "with being guilty of an offence within the meaning of the Greenock Port and Harbours Act, 1866, and of the relative bye-laws and regulations enacted by the Parliamentary Trustees of the Port and Harbours of Greenock, dated at Greenock 7th January 1868, in so far as, on the 9th day of July 1890, he did, while in charge of the said steamship 'Eleanore,' and while sailing on the River or Firth of Clyde between Cartsdyke Quay on the east and Forsyth Street on the west, fail to slow the engines and to keep at a slow rate."

The particular bye-law alleged to have been contravened was the 68th, which provided,—"The master or other person in charge of every steam vessel shall, sailing between Forsyth Street on the west and Cartsdyke Quay on the east, slow the engines and keep at a slow rate."

The complainer, inter alia, averred that it was proved at the trial that the "Eleanore" was, on the occasion libelled, proceeding in the fairway or navigable channel of the Firth of Clyde, and was at no time nearer the port and harbours of Greenock than between 120 and 150 yards. The 83d section of the Greenock Port and Harbours Act of 1866 conferred no power upon the trustees to regulate the speed of vessels outside the limits of the said port and harbours, and the trustees had no power to make bye-laws except by virtue of the section. The 68th bye-law gave the trustees no jurisdiction over vessels sailing in the fairway or navigable channel of the Firth of Clyde between the points mentioned in the bye-law, but only over vessels sailing between the points within the limits of the port and harbours, and defined by the Act of 1866.

The complainer, inter alia, pleaded;—(2) It being established by the facts proved at the trial of the said complaint, that the locus of the alleged offence was not within the jurisdiction of the Police Court of Greenock, the said conviction and sentence were ultra vires and illegal, and ought to be suspended.

Argued for the complainer;—The Act of 1866, under which the bye-law said to have been contravened was made, gave power to the trustees to regulate the speed of steam vessels only "within the port and harbours of Greenock." They had no power to interfere with vessels sailing in the navigable channel of the river between the points mentioned in the bye-law.[1] The bye-law was therefore ultra vires. The 83d section of the Harbour, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, gave them no power to make bye-laws outside the area of their jurisdiction.*

Argued for respondent;—(1) The bye-law was within the powers conferred by the Act of 1866. The harbour works extended between the points mentioned in the bye-law. (2) In any case the Act of 1847 gave power to the trustees to regulate the motions of vessels wholly outside the harbour, if such tended to injure a vessel "at or near" any pier.

LORD ADAM.—This is a suspension brought at the instance of John Kerr, mate of the steamer "Eleanore," against the Procurator-fiscal of the Burgh Court of Greenock, of a sentence dated 21st July 1890, by which the suspender was found guilty of a certain offence charged against him, and adjudged to pay the sum of 60s. of penalty, and in default of payment to be imprisoned for twenty days.

The offence with which he was charged was, that within the meaning of the Greenock Port and Harbours Act, 1866, and of the relative bye-laws and regulations enacted by the Parliamentary Trustees of the Port and Harbour of Greenock, dated 7th January 1868, he did, while in charge of the steamship "Eleanore," and while sailing in the River or Firth of Clyde, between Cartsdyke Quay on the east and Forsyth Street on the west, fail to slow the engines and to keep at a slow rate.

The particular bye-law alleged to have been contravened is not specified in the complaint, but is the 68th, and is in these terms,—"The master or other person in charge of every steam vessel shall, sailing between Forsyth Street on the west and Cartsdyke Quay on the east, slow the engines and keep at a slow rate."

The ground of suspension is that this bye-law is ultra vires of the trustees.

By the 93d section of the Greenock Port and Harbours Act, 1866, the trustees have power to make such bye-laws as they may think fit for certain purposes, and, inter alia, for regulating the conduct of the owners, masters, and crews of vessels propelled by steam, with regard to the rate of speed at which they may proceed within the port and harbours of Greenock. There is no power given to the trustees to make bye-laws to regulate the speed of vessels elsewhere than in the port or harbours.

It will be observed that the bye-law in question professes to regulate the speed of vessels sailing between Forsyth Street on the west and Cartsdyke Quay on the east, but there is no definition of any boundary ex adverso of the shore or harbour between these two points, so that the bye-law implies and proceeds upon the footing that the whole river ex adverso of the shore between these two points is within the port and harbours of Greenock, and so within their jurisdiction. If the fact be so, then the bye-law would be valid; if the fact be otherwise, then the bye-law would appear to be ultra vires and bad.

There does not appear to be any room for doubt as to how the fact stands in this respect, because it was decided in the case of Hunter v. The Northern Marine Insurance Company, 14 R. 544, 15 R. (H. L.) 72, that the port and harbour of Greenock does not include the navigable channel of the river, but is limited to the artificial works vested in the Harbour Trustees, and such contiguous water as may be necessary for the accommodation of vessels using these works.

That being so, it is clear that the bye-law professes to regulate the speed of vessels over an area which is not within their jurisdiction, and is therefore invalid.

shall think fit for all or any of the following purposes. . . . For preventing damage or injury to any vessel or goods within the harbour or dock, or at or near the pier."

No. 6.

Dec. 19, 1890.
Kerr v. Auld.

It follows that if the bye-law is invalid the conviction of the suspender for an alleged contravention of it must be bad.

But the respondent endeavoured to support the bye-law under the Harbour, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, by the 83d section of which the trustees have power to make bye-laws for preventing damage or injury to any vessel or goods within the harbour or dock, or at or near the pier, or on the premises of the undertakers. It was said that any vessel steaming rapidly past would cause damage to a vessel lying at the pier, and therefore that the trustees had power to protect such vessel by regulating the speed of passing vessels. I should think that it was sufficiently clear that any bye-law they might make for this purpose could have effect only within the area of their jurisdiction. It may be that the trustees may be able to make a bye-law of some limited nature which may be effectual for the purpose—as to which I offer no opinion—but I am clearly of opinion that they have no power to make such a bye-law as the one in question.

On the whole matter I am of opinion that the conviction must be suspended.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

THE COURT passed the bill, suspended the conviction and sentence complained of simpliciter, and decerned.

ALEXANDER SCOTT who was in prison on a charge of fabricating and uttering five bills of the total value of about £500, the signatures of the drawers and acceptors thereof being forged, applied to be admitted to bail.

The accused had emitted a declaration in which he admitted the charge, but explained that he had discounted the bills for the sake of customers, and had received no consideration or advantage from the transaction.

The Sheriff refused to admit him to bail.

He appealed to the High Court of Justiciary.

At advising,—

LORD STORMONTH DARLING.—I have consulted with my brother Lord M'Laren, and we are of opinion that, looking to the serious character of the crime charged against the prisoner, we should not be justified in granting the application for bail. No doubt in one view it seems a little hard to use the confession of the prisoner against him, but at the same time his confession displaces the presumption of innocence on which such an application is largely founded. I apprehend this is not a case in which there will be undue delay in bringing the accused to trial. For these reasons we think the application cannot be granted.

THE COURT refused the appeal.

Appeal—Suspension—Competency—Revenue—7 and 8 Geo. IV. c. 53, sec. 79.—A person who had been convicted in a Justice of Peace Court of selling beer by retail without having obtained a certificate and excise licence, in contravention of the Act 24 and 25 Vict. c. 91, brought a suspension of the conviction on the ground that the Justices before convicting had seen and considered a previous conviction for a similar offence.

The Court refused the bill, holding that although the High Court had notwithstanding the provisions of the Act 7 and 8 Geo. IV. c. 53, sec. 79,* power to entertain suspensions in certain exceptional circumstances, the averment of the complainer was not such as to entitle him to that remedy.

Opinions that the modes of review open to the complainer were appeal to the Quarter Sessions, or appeal to the High Court on a case stated under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals (Scotland) Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. c. 62), or appeal to the Court of Exchequer.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Ld. Stormonth Darling. Lord Low. Justiciary Clerk.

DONALD MACKENZIE, Stornoway, brought a bill of suspension against Henry Martin, officer of Inland Revenue at Stornoway, craving suspension of a conviction and sentence pronounced on 27th June 1890, whereby he was found guilty by two Justices of the Peace of a contravention of the Act 24 and 25 Vict. c. 91, in so far as he had sold beer by retail "without having duly obtained a certificate, and also an excise licence."

The complainer stated that "after the evidence had been led, Mr Thomas Shillington, excise officer, Portree, who appeared on behalf of the respondent, referred to the fact that the complainer had been convicted of a similar offence before. Mr C. G. Mackenzie, who appeared on behalf of the complainer, protested against any reference being made to said previous conviction, but the Justices overruled his objection, and in coming to a judgment had in their minds the fact that the complainer had been previously convicted, and looked at the previous conviction, and in giving judgment referred to that fact." The complainer further averred that the reference to and consideration of the previous conviction in the circumstances was illegal, oppressive, and contrary to statute.

The respondent objected to the competency of the suspension on the ground that review by suspension was excluded by 7 and 8 Geo. IV. c. 53, sec. 99.[1]

The complainer argued that the suspension was competent, as the Justices had acted contrary to the known rules of judicial procedure, and therefore illegally.[2]

Mackenzie v. Martin.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is a bill of suspension against a conviction by two Justices in an excise prosecution. It has been stated by counsel for the complainer that the ground of suspension on which he relies is, that at the trial something illegal was done, viz., allowing a previous conviction to be referred to before judgment on the complaint. The first thing which we have to consider is what course the complainer here might have taken for the purpose of having that decision reviewed. It appears to me that there were two courses, if not three, open to him. It was competent to him to have a new trial by appeal to the Quarter Sessions. Such an appeal would have set aside altogether the whole previous proceedings except the complaint, and his case would have been tried by Quarter Sessions as if it had been a Court of original jurisdiction. Again, he might have presented an appeal to this Court upon a case stated in accordance with the case of Schulze. Thirdly, he might have taken an appeal to the Court of Exchequer. As regards this last mode of appeal, I do not think it necessary in this case to come to any conclusion upon the question whether that would have been a good or efficient remedy for the wrong of which he complains, because I think we have sufficient for the purpose of dealing with this case in the two modes of review I have already referred to. In my judgment, his proper remedy in the circumstances was an appeal to Quarter Sessions. Now, in these circumstances I do not think suspension is competent. Suspension is excluded by the Act of Geo. IV., and although this Court has often held that, notwithstanding exclusion of review by suspension, it can entertain a suspension of proceedings where what is complained of is that inferior magistrates have gone outside their jurisdiction, this is not a case of that nature.

LORD STORMONTH DARLING.—I concur. Prima facie our jurisdiction to review by way of suspension is excluded by the Act of Geo. IV., and while I agree in what has been said as to the jurisdiction of this Court in cases of flagrant injustice, it seems to me that this is not a case of that exceptional character. I also agree in what your Lordship has said as to the modes of review open to the complainer.

LORD LOW.—I am of the same opinion. It is not disputed that the complaint was properly laid under the Act 24 and 25 Vict. c. 91, and that it is a complaint which the Justices have jurisdiction to entertain and deal with. What is alleged is, that in considering the case the Justices had before them and considered a previous conviction which they ought not to have considered. That seems to me to be simply an averment that the Justices allowed incompetent evidence, and that to my mind is not a good ground for allowing the complainer here to have a remedy which is expressly excluded by statute. I think the remedies open to the complainer by statute, to which your Lordship has referred, were amply sufficient to enable him to bring under review that of which he now complains.

THE COURT refused the bill as incompetent, and decerned.

IV., and* 1 Vict. c. 41), sec. 31—Oppression.—In an action in the Sheriff Small-Debt Court for payment of £10 alleged to have been lent by the pursuer to the defender, the defender stated that the sum sued for had been given as a present to her by the pursuer. The Sheriff-substitute, on the pursuer's motion, took his oath, and refused to allow the defender to lead any evidence, and decerned against her for the sum sued for.

The Court recalled the Sheriff-substitute's judgment, holding (1) that as the defender's admission that she had received the money from the pursuer was qualified by the statement that it was a donation, the Sheriff was not entitled to proceed upon the admission, and the pursuer's testimony that it was not a donation, and to exclude the defender's evidence; and (2) that the irregularity in the procedure was such as to make an appeal competent under the Small-Debt Act, 1837, sec. 31.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Ld. Stormonth Darling. Lord Low. Justiciary Clerk.

ALEXINA GORDON, 32 Castle Terrace, Edinburgh, appealed against a decree for £10 pronounced against her in the Sheriff Small-Debt Court at Edinburgh on 10th December 1890 upon a summons at the instance of John Mulholland, Leithen Crescent, Innerleithen, for payment of that sum alleged to have been lent to her by him.

The appellant made the following statement, the accuracy of which was not denied:—"On the case being called before Mr Sheriff-substitute Hamilton in the Small-Debt Court at Edinburgh on said 10th December 1890, the parties appeared by their respective agents, and the appellant's agent stated that the sum sued for had been given as a present to the appellant by the respondent, to whom she was at that time engaged to be married, but who had since broken off the engagement, and that the same was not resting owing to the respondent. The Sheriff-substitute, however, on the motion of the respondent's agent, referred the cause to the oath of the respondent; refused to allow the appellant to lead any further evidence in support of her case, and decerned in favour of the respondent for the sum sued for."

Argued for the appellant;—The proceedings in the Sheriff Court were incompetent or oppressive. The pursuer had no evidence of loan, and could not found on the defender's admission without its qualification. It was therefore not necessary for the defender to refer to the pursuer's oath. If the pursuer had no other evidence it was for him to refer the case to the defender's oath. If the pursuer was regarded as a witness the defender was entitled to lead evidence on the other side. She cited the undernoted authorities.[1]

Argued for the respondent;—The Sheriff had held that the receipt of the money implied a loan, and that donation could only be proved by the pursuer's writ or oath, and the defender must be taken to have consented to the reference.[2] The Sheriff's error, if any, was one in law.[3]

Gordon v. Mulholland.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The first and most startling feature of this case is, that the procedure which took place resulted in exactly the opposite decision being pronounced to that which to all appearance must have been pronounced had the proper procedure taken place. The case was decided by the Sheriff on the merits, and in the way which he thought competent, viz., by the oath of the pursuer. No such oath should have been taken. In these circumstances it is difficult to see where there could be oppression without intention if it does not exist in this case. The Act of Parliament provides that we must proceed upon malice, oppression, or incompetency, but in nine cases out of ten where it is the duty of the Court to interfere it is not the case that there is any intentional oppression. No one can doubt that what was done here was done in good faith. It appears to have been argued to the Sheriff that, in respect of the defender's admission that she received the money, the case had to be referred to the pursuer's oath. But that admission was made with the explanation, intrinsic to the admission, that the money was given to her as a gift. The Sheriff was not entitled to take one-half of the admission, and upon that to shut the defender out from leading any evidence in the case. This is a case—taking it at the best for the respondent—in which the defender was at least entitled to lead evidence. The Sheriff has decided the case upon the merits without hearing any evidence from the defender, and I think that in law amounts to oppression.

LORD STORMONTH DARLING concurred.

LORD LOW.—I entirely concur. I do not think it is necessary to specify the particular ground of appeal under the statute under which this appeal falls. The words of the statute are corruption or malice and oppression, such deviation in point of form from the statutory enactments as the Court shall think took place wilfully or have prevented substantial justice from having been done, and incompetency, including defect of jurisdiction. It seems to me that we have a very good guide given us in this case by similar decisions in regard to decreets-arbitral, where questions have arisen as to what is, and what is not, corruption on the part of an arbiter. It has been settled that mere error in judgment on the part of an arbiter will not amount to corruption, and, on the other hand, that it is not necessary that there should be anything like wilful injustice, but if you have something more than mere error in judgment, something done or refused to be done by the arbiter which makes it impossible that justice can be done in the case, that has been held to amount to corruption. I think that is the case here. There was here such gross irregularity of procedure that it was impossible that justice could be done, and upon that ground I have no hesitation in agreeing with your Lordships. I think it is just that kind of case which would be held to be corruption in the case of a decreet-arbitral.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, recalled the judgment or decree complained of, and remitted to the Sheriff to proceed with the case in terms of law, and decerned.

Poaching—Accessory—Poaching Prevention Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 114), sec. 2.—Circumstances in which it was held that a Sheriff was entitled to draw the inference that a carrier who had been found carrying in his cart a quantity of rabbits had been accessory before the fact to the act of poaching of the person from whom he had received the rabbits for carriage.

Question whether, if a carrier were found to have been "accessory" after the fact, it would warrant a conviction under the Act.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-Clerk.
Ld. Stormonth Darling.
Lord Low.
Justiciary Clerk.

ALEXANDER YOUNG, carrier, Collace, Perthshire, was charged, at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal of Perth, with having been, on 18th July 1890, on the public road leading from Perth to Coupar-Angus, "found by James Cowie, police-constable, Balbeggie, said parish, in possession of forty rabbits, which the said James Cowie then seized, the said James Cowie then having, as he still has, good cause to suspect the said Alexander Young of coming from land where he had been unlawfully in search or pursuit of game, or of aiding or abetting some person or persons to the complainer unknown, in so doing, and the said Alexander Young obtained said rabbits by unlawfully going on land in search or pursuit of game, or was accessory thereto, contrary to the Act 25 and 26 Vict. cap. 114, sec. 2,* whereby the said Alexander Young is liable to forfeit," &c.

The Sheriff-substitute (Grahame), after hearing evidence, convicted the accused, who thereafter obtained a case, in which the following facts were stated:—"(1) That the appellant, a common carrier, was found on a public road by the police carrying in his cart on the day in question a bag containing forty rabbits. (2) That James Cowie, police-constable, who made the search, had good cause to suspect the appellant of coming from land where he had been unlawfully in search or pursuit of game, or of aiding or abetting some other person in so doing, contrary to the Act 25 and 26 Victoria, chapter 114. (3) That the said rabbits were obtained by the appellant early in the morning of the day libelled from a person who was seen to approach the appellant's house about three o'clock in the morning of the same day, carrying a bag which seemed heavy, and was similar in appearance to the one found on the appellant's cart, the sound of two men's voices being immediately thereafter heard at the house, and the shadow of the appellant's head being seen passing one of the windows. (4) That the man who carried the bag to appellant's house had a noiseless footfall as if wearing goloshes. (5) That the rabbits presented the appearance of being all netted, with the exception of one which had been killed by a trap. (6) That the rabbits were addressed to a game-dealer in Perth, without the name of the sender, and that there were holes in the bag through which the feet of some of the rabbits protruded. (7) That the appellant did not give the name of any person from whom he had received the rabbits to shew their lawful possession by the person from whom he received them. (8) That the person from whom the appellant received the rabbits had come from land where he had been unlawfully in search of game, and that the appellant, in so receiving them, and carrying them in his cart, was aiding and abetting said person in his unlawful acts."

The appellant argued that the Sheriff-substitute was not entitled to draw the inference from the facts as stated by him, that the appellant had aided and abetted the person from whom he received the poached rabbits, assuming them to have been poached.

The respondent cited the undernoted authorities.[1]

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—We have now before us in this case the facts on which the Sheriff proceeded in finding the appellant to be guilty as an accessory to this act of poaching. Upon these facts the first question for us to decide is, whether the Sheriff could be entitled to hold that the appellant was accessory, not merely as having received the rabbits, but as knowing beforehand that poaching was to be committed? If that question is answered in the affirmative, it makes it unnecessary to decide the other and more difficult question as to whether a carrier might be accessory merely by receiving into his possession rabbits and game from a person coming from land on which he had taken them by poaching, and continuing his act by conveying them. If that question had to be decided, it would present greater difficulties, although I cannot say I think I should have serious difficulty in finding that a conviction might follow. I think the facts here were facts from which the Sheriff was entitled to find that the appellant was accessory throughout, that the bringing of the rabbits to him was not an unexpected event, but one which was prearranged. (After narrating the facts stated his Lordship proceeded)—In these circumstances it seems to me that the Sheriff was entitled, if after seeing the witnesses and hearing the evidence he thought that was a good inference, to find that the appellant was accessory to the unlawful going on the land for the purpose of taking game or rabbits. I am fortified in that opinion by the fact that the appellant did not give any reasonable explanation of the circumstances. I think in such circumstances a reasonable explanation might make it impossible to find a person guilty. On the other hand, the want of explanation is a fact which may aid the inference of guilt. I am therefore of opinion that we must sustain the conviction.

LORD STORMONTH DARLING.—I agree that this case does not require us to decide whether the word "accessory" includes accessory after, as well as before, the fact, because I agree that the facts as found by the Sheriff were such as to entitle him to come to the conclusion that this man was accessory to the unlawful obtaining of the rabbits, even upon the view that the accession must be before the fact. The Sheriff is final upon the facts. This Court can only review him upon an error in law. It cannot review the inference drawn by him from the facts, unless it is an inference which upon the rules of evidence cannot be drawn. I cannot say that the inference here is in that category. On the contrary, I think if I had been in the place of the Sheriff I should have drawn the same inference.

Intimidation—Complaint—Relevancy—Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. c. 86), sec. 7 (1).—The Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875, enacts, by section 7,—"Every person who, with a view to compel any other person to abstain from doing, or to do, any act which such other person has a legal right to do or abstain from doing, wrongfully and without legal authority (1) uses violence to or intimidates such other person, or his wife or children, or injures his property . . ." shall be liable to certain penalties.

A complaint charging J. M. with a contravention of the Act set forth that the accused, with a view to compel A. C. to abstain from a work in which he was engaged, and which he had a legal right to do, "did wrongfully and without legal authority intimidate A. C. by threatening him while so working" with personal violence if he continued to work.

Held that the complaint was relevant, although it did not state that the threat had the effect of inducing A. C. to abstain from work.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Ld. M'Laren. Lord Trayner. Ld. Wellwood. Justiciary Clerk.

ON 9th December 1890, James Munro, butcher, Dundee, and secretary of the Dundee Branch of the Dock, Wharf, Riverside, and General Labourers' Union, was charged, at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal of Dundee, on a complaint which set forth that the accused, "with a view to compel the persons after named, who were then engaged working at or in connection with the discharging of the steamer 'Moravia,' then lying in Dundee Harbour, to abstain from doing said work, which work said persons had a legal right to do, did, after attempting to induce said persons to abstain from doing said work by offering them money, wrongfully, and without legal authority, intimidate (1) Alexander Christie, seaman, 2 John Street Crescent, Dundee, by threatening him, while so working, that if he did not abstain from doing said work, he would 'wear sore bones for it one of these nights'"; —(Here followed the names of certain other persons and the threats used against them)—"the said James Munro meaning by the foresaid threats that personal violence would be used to the said Alexander Christie, James Preston, David Stewart, and Martin Polland if they continued to work as aforesaid; and all this the said James Munro did contrary to section 7 of the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875."

The Sheriff-substitute (Campbell Smith) gave the complainer an opportunity of amending the complaint by adding to it a statement that, in consequence of the threats aforesaid, "the said persons were intimidated and abstained from doing work that they had a legal right to do." The complainer declined to amend, and the Sheriff-substitute dismissed the complaint as irrelevant.

The complainer took a case, in which the above facts were stated.

The question of law for the opinion of the High Court of Justiciary was,—"Whether in the complaint there is relevantly averred any contravention of the 7th section of the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875?"

The appellant cited Judge v. Bennett, Nov. 16, 1887, 36 Weekly Reporter, 103.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The clause in the Act of Parliament with which we have to deal is very clear and distinct. It sets forth that "Every person who, with a view to compel any other person to abstain from doing, or to do, any act which such person has a legal right to do or abstain from doing, wrongfully and without legal authority (1) uses violence to or intimidates such other person, or his wife or children, or injures his property," shall be liable to certain penalties. That makes it quite plain that the action of the person does not depend for its criminality on its success. If a person uses violence or intimidates with a view to make a person abstain from doing what he has a right to do, it is an offence, whether the person abstains or not.

I think the complaint in this case is well drawn to describe an offence under the statute. There is the statement that what was done was wrongful; there is the statement that the accused intimidated; there is a narrative of the threats used, which are plainly threats of personal violence. That statement satisfies subsection 1 of section 7. I think that clause would be perfectly nugatory if read as the Sheriff reads it. The object and intention of it is to prevent persons endeavouring by such means to induce other persons to give up doing what they have a right to do. I have therefore no doubt that the Sheriff was wrong.

We have been referred to the case of Judge v. Bennett. In that case the opinions have evidently been taken down in a very cursory manner, but I do not think they differ from the views I have expressed. The beginning of Mr Justice Stephen's opinion cannot be correctly reported, as it is unintelligible. The result of his opinion is, I think, that it is the intention and character of the threats that must be looked to—whether they are threats which are intended to and calculated to raise alarm. By alarm I do not mean necessarily physical fear, but the alarm of a good citizen that he or his family may suffer personal violence. So also Mr Justice Smith says—"Intimidation is not merely to use violence or to threaten to use violence. What is the meaning of 'intimidates'? Why, the using of the language which causes another man to fear." I do not read that as meaning that physical fear must be actually produced, but only that the conduct must be such as tends to cause alarm. In the case in question there was no suggestion that there was any expression of fear on the part of the person intimidated.

LORD M'LAREN.—I think it is important that no doubt should be cast upon the interpretation of the seventh section of the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act. That section was introduced into an Act which repealed certain disabilities which formerly existed regarding trade combinations to make it clear that while persons were at liberty to combine for lawful purposes, the law would protect those who are outside the combination from illegal acts.

I do not at all participate in the doubts that seem to have been entertained by the Sheriff-substitute when he proposed to the prosecutor to make his case clear by averring that the persons intimidated had abstained from doing work which they had a legal right to do. The statute contains no such restriction. It gives protection to persons intimidated with a view to compel them to abstain from continuing to work. I should have held, independently of these prefatory words, that the offence of intimidation was complete if the person to whom the threats were applied had been put in reasonable apprehension of harm to himself or his family in consequence of his refusing to comply with the demand of the person threatening. I can hardly imagine that the Legislature could have enacted a clause that would give protection only to the coward who acts in accordance with the wishes of the person who intimidates him, and refuse protection to the honest and capable man who has the courage to resist intimidation while at the same time feeling a reasonable apprehension that the threats may be acted upon. The one is as much entitled to the protection of the law as the other. I agree that the Act of Parliament plainly contemplates such a case as is here averred, and that the complaint is quite relevant.

LORD TRAYNER.—I think it would be to deprive the statute of a great part of its benefit if the idea were entertained that intimidation was not punishable unless it was successful. The purpose of the Act is to prevent intimidation, and if a man intimidates another with a view to prevent him doing something he has a right to do, he commits the offence. I have no doubt that the complaint is relevant.

LORD WELLWOOD.—I am of the same opinion. I think it is plain that in order to make a charge under this section of the statute relevant it is not necessary to aver that the intimidation charged was successful in the sense of compelling the person intimidated to abstain from doing or to do any act which that person had a legal right to do or abstain from doing. The offence is complete when intimidation is practised "with a view to compel any other person to abstain," &c.

But it was argued that the prosecutor should at least have averred that the persons said to have been threatened were intimidated. If such an averment is required for the purpose of relevancy—and perhaps it is—it is in the complaint, because the complaint charges that the accused "did intimidate" the person in question.

If the meaning of the objection is that the prosecutor should have averred that the persons intimidated were made afraid, I do not think that the objection is well founded. To prove the statutory charge I think it is sufficient to prove that the intimidation used was such as to induce serious apprehension of violence in the mind of a man of ordinary courage, although it might not be successful in making him afraid.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, reversed the determination of the inferior Judge, and remitted to him to proceed according to law, and decerned.

The appeal was taken to the Circuit Court at Glasgow, and was certified by Lord Trayner to the High Court of Justiciary.

The appeal set forth,—"That on the 25th day of June 1890 the respondent took out a summons against the appellant to appear in the Sheriff Small-Debt Court at Kinning Park upon the 4th day of July 1890, at eleven of the clock forenoon, to answer to an alleged claim for payment of the sum of £12. . . .

The appellant had his witnesses in attendance, but was not even asked his defence. The Sheriff-substitute continued the cause by a minute in the Court books in these terms:—'Continues till 31st July current, Paisley Court.'

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Ld. M'Laren. Lord Trayner. Ld. Wellwood. Ld. Kyllachy. Justiciary Clerk.

The appeal was taken to the Circuit Court at Glasgow, and was certified by Lord Trayner to the High Court of Justiciary.

The appeal set forth,—"That on the 25th day of June 1890 the respondent took out a summons against the appellant to appear in the Sheriff Small-Debt Court at Kinning Park upon the 4th day of July 1890, at eleven of the clock forenoon, to answer to an alleged claim for payment of the sum of £12. . . .

"On the case being called in Court the respondent's agent moved the Court to continue the case, in respect that two of the witnesses he had cited had failed to attend. . . . The appellant had his witnesses in attendance, but was not even asked his defence. The Sheriff-substitute continued the cause by a minute in the Court books in these terms:—'Continues till 31st July current, Paisley Court.'

"About a fortnight before the 31st day of July the appellant and respondent had met and agreed to refer the subject in dispute to two mutual friends, who had agreed to act, and met the parties several times without their agents, and the matter was still before them on the 31st day of July last. Notwithstanding this reference, the respondent and his agent attended in the Sheriff Court in Paisley, and took decree in absence of the appellant for £12 of damages, and £1, 10s. 5d. of expenses. The entry in the Court minute-book is in these terms:—'Decerns in respect of absence at diet of proof, and for £1, 10s. 5d. of expenses, with 10s. of agent's fee, with execution after a charge of ten free days.'"

On 6th August the appellant, in virtue of section 16 of the Small-Debt Act, 1837,* obtained a warrant sisting execution of the decree in absence,

* The Small-Debt Act, 1837 (7 Will. IV. and 1 Vict. c. 41), sec. 16, provides,—"And be it enacted that where a decree has been pronounced in absence of a defender, it shall be competent for him, upon consigning the expenses decerned for, and the further sum of ten shillings to meet further expenses, in the hands of the clerk, . . . to obtain from the clerk a warrant signed by him sisting execution till the next Court day, . . . and such warrant being duly served . . . . shall be an authority for hearing the which warrant or sist was duly served upon the respondent, to have the case heard on 21st August.

On the case being called in Court on 21st August, the Sheriff-substitute (Begg) wrote a decree or deliverance dismissing the sist as incompetent, on the ground that the decree in absence, pronounced at Paisley on 31st July, "was a decree in foro, and could not be sisted, and accordingly he dismissed the sist as incompetent, and confirmed the decree previously granted."

The appellant maintained (1) that as he had duly complied with the provisions of section 16 of the Small-Debt Act, 1837, it was the Sheriff's duty to have heard the cause. "(2) By the Sheriff's refusal to allow the cause to be heard, he has wilfully disregarded the statutory enactment above narrated, and has done substantial injustice to the appellant. (3) The parties in this case have never joined issue, nor has litiscontestation taken place, and the decree pronounced on 31st July last was in absence of the defender and appellant, and neither the pursuer nor the defender has been heard on the claim, and the defender and appellant has had no opportunity of pleading his defence, or adducing evidence in support thereof."

Argued for the appellant;—This appeal was taken under section 31 of the Small-Debt Act, there having been here such deviation in point of form from the statutory enactments as had prevented substantial justice from being done. There had been no litiscontestatio, and consequently the decree pronounced by the Sheriff-substitute on 31st July was one in absence, and being in absence the warrant sisting execution of the decree under section 16 should have been sustained by the Sheriff-substitute. If the decree was not a decree in absence in the ordinary sense, it was one which had passed "in absence of the defender" in the sense of section 16.[1] That section fell to be construed liberally, inasmuch as it provided against the hardship of a defender or pursuer being left without a remedy if he happened through no fault of his own to be absent when the case was called. It was to be gathered from the opinion of Lord Mure in the case of Worrall[2] that there had been such action taken by the parties in Court as amounted to litiscontestation.

Argued for respondent;—The Sheriff had taken the proper course in refusing to sustain the warrant sisting the execution of the decree of 31st July. The question really was whether the decree was one in foro or one in absence, for section 16 applied only to decrees in absence, and not to decrees in foro. This was not a decree in absence in any sense. There had clearly been litiscontestatio, and a decree after litiscontestatio could not be a decree in absence. This was a decree by default, and therefore a decree in foro.[3]

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case came before Lord Trayner at the Glasgow Circuit Court, and in consequence of the decision in the case of Worrall was certified to this sitting of the High Court.

cause; and in like manner where absolvitor has passed in absence of the pursuer, . . . it shall be competent for him . . . to obtain a warrant, signed by the clerk, for citing the defender and witnesses for both parties, which warrant . . . . shall be an authority for hearing the cause. . . ."

Montgomery v. Loughran.

By the Small-Debt Act appearance in the Small-Debt Court may be sufficiently made by the personal appearance of the party in the case, or of someone to represent him. According to the practice of the Court, what occurs is, that, when a case is called, the Clerk of Court ascertains whether the parties are present by their answering or failing to answer. So far as we can learn from the record in this case, that is all that took place so far as the defender was concerned. He obeyed the citation, and when the case was called announced that he was present. The pursuer not wishing to go on got an adjournment.

In that state of matters, apart from the case of Worrall, my opinion is, that a decree pronounced at a subsequent sitting of the Court, in the absence of one of the parties, would not be a decree by default in respect of litiscontestation, but a decree in absence only.

The only difficulty arises from the case of Worrall. But I am quite satisfied from the opinion of Lord Mure in that case, that there must have been circumstances disclosed upon the record of Court, which shewed that a great deal more had taken place than the mere announcement by the defender of his presence upon the case being called, because I find that Lord Mure says this,—"The view I take of the question is, that after both parties have appeared in Court and there has been litiscontestation, there cannot be a decree in absence on either side."

I read that as meaning the appearance of the parties in Court followed by such action on their part in Court as amounted to litiscontestation. The mere appearance of the defender could not constitute that. A defender may appear as matter of respect to the Court, and not to state a defence. I therefore take it that Lord Mure means two different things by appearance and litiscontestation, and that there must have been evidence that litiscontestation had taken place. I am of opinion, accordingly, that this case is distinguishable from the case of Worrall, and without giving any opinion as to whether I should have agreed with the judgment in that case, I think that in this case there was no litiscontestation, and that the decree at the continued diet was not a decree by default, but a decree in absence, against which the defender was entitled to be reponed.

I am therefore of opinion that the Sheriff has erred in such a manner as entitles us to review his judgment, and that his judgment should be recalled, and the case remitted to him.

LORD M'LAREN.—In the jurisprudence of this country a distinction is taken between decrees in absence and in foro of this nature, that where a party has not been heard or has not taken the first step towards a hearing in his own defence, he is entitled upon certain conditions to be reponed in order that his defence may be stated.

Although there is a difference between the forms of procedure in the Small-Debt Court and the Courts of higher jurisdiction, yet the essentials of a decree in absence are, I think, in both cases the same. In order that a decree may be treated as a decree in foro, something must be done by the defender to traverse the allegations in law or in fact upon which the conclusions of the writ are directed against him. In the Court of Session and in the Sheriff's Ordinary Court this is done by putting in defences, but as defences are not necessary in the Small-Debt Court, it appears to me that there can only be litiscontestation by a defender appearing and stating some defence or calling a witness—in short, beginning the proceedings of a contested case. His mere assent to a motion for opinion upon the point referred to by Lord Trayner and Lord Kyllachy, because I am not clear that we have materials for raising such a question, and it is plain enough that there is room for a distinction between a decree where the merits have not been entered upon, and one pronounced after some progress has been made with the case.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, and remitted to the Sheriff to proceed with the case.

ALEXANDER MACKIE, Respondent.—Law.

Bankruptcy—Bankruptcy Frauds and Disabilities (Scotland) Act, 1884 (47 and 48 Vict. c. 16), sec. 4—Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. c. 34), sec. 13—Credit obtained by undischarged bankrupt—Complaint—Relevancy.—The Bankruptcy Frauds and Disabilities Act, 1884, sec. 4, enacts that an undischarged bankrupt who obtains credit to the extent of £20, without informing the person from whom he obtains it that he is an undischarged bankrupt, shall be deemed guilty of a crime and offence, "and may be dealt with and punished as if he had been guilty of a crime and offence under the Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880, and the provisions of that Act shall apply to proceedings under this section." The 13th section of the Act of 1880 * enacts that the debtor in a process of sequestration or cessio shall be deemed guilty of a crime and offence, and, on conviction, shall be liable to imprisonment "(A) in each of the cases following, unless he proves to the satisfaction of the Court that he had no intent to defraud—that is to say—[Here various offences in relation to the disclosure of the state of his affairs to the trustee are specified]; (B) in each of the cases following . . ."

Held that it is not necessary to the relevancy of a complaint under section 4 of the Act of 1884 that the prosecutor should libel "intent to defraud," and that it is not necessary for the prosecutor to prove an intent to defraud.

Question whether the proviso in sec. 13 of the Act of 1880, "unless he prove . . . that he had no intent to defraud," was incorporated by reference into section 4 of the Act of 1884.

Opinions per Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Trayner, and Lord Wellwood that it was not, and that the reference was merely as to the mode of trial and the punishment to be awarded.

Opinion per Lord M'Laren that it was incorporated.

Opinions per Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Trayner, and Lord Wellwood that an intent to defraud was not an element in the statutory offence.

ALEXANDER MACKIE was charged under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881, and Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, Howman v. Mackie.

1887, at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal of Kirkwall with a complaint, which set forth that, "being an undischarged bankrupt within the meaning of the Act first hereinafter mentioned, at Burness, Firth Parish, Island of Pomona, Orkney, or at some other place on the island of Pomona and county of Orkney, in the month of December 1888 or January 1889," he did "obtain credit to the amount of £60 sterling from Robert Stevenson, farmer, Burness aforesaid, without informing him that he was an undischarged bankrupt, contrary to the Act 47 and 48 Vict. cap. 16, section 4, and he has thereby incurred the penalties provided by 43 and 44 Vict. cap. 34, section 13, applicable to conviction by the Sheriff without a jury."

The Sheriff-substitute (Armour) having found the complaint irrelevant, a case was taken by the Procurator-fiscal under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875.

The Sheriff-substitute stated as follows:—"The respondent appeared on 15th July 1890, when his agent objected that the complaint was irrelevant, in respect (1) that the respondent was not charged with obtaining the credit with intent to defraud; and (2) that the respondent was not charged with any statutory offence under section 4 of 47 and 48 Vict. cap. 16, and section 13 of 43 and 44 Vict. cap. 34.

"The respondent argued that intent to defraud was of the essence of the crime; that unless intent to defraud was libelled and established by proof by the appellant, no crime or offence under section 4 of 47 and 48 Vict. cap. 16, and section 13 of 43 and 44 Vict. cap. 34, could be brought home to the respondent. In support of this contention reference was made to the cases of Duncan v. Cooper, Feb. 3, 1886, 13 R. (Just. Cases) 36, 1 White, 43, and Small v. Hart, March 12, 1886, 13 R. (Just. Cases) 45, 1 White, 80.

"The appellant contended that to constitute the statutory crime and offence libelled he neither required to libel 'intent to defraud' nor to instruct such intent by evidence; that the clause in the Act of 1884, under which this prosecution was brought, did not say anything about intent to defraud; that the respondent was guilty of the statutory crime and offence if the statements averred in the complaint were proved, and he undertook to do this. He made reference to the opinion expressed by Lord Craighill in the case of Small v. Hart, referred to by the respondent, and to the case of H. M. Advocate v. Livingstone, Feb. 29, 1888, 15 R. (Just. Cases) 48.

"I held that the present case was ruled by the decision of the Court in Small v. Hart, but looking to section 8 of 50 and 51 Vict. cap. 35, and the case of H. M. Advocate v. Swan, Dec. 10, 1888, 16 R. (Just. Cases), p. 34, had doubts as to whether the complaint could be held irrelevant. The appellant, however, declined to argue that fraudulent intent was to be implied; on the contrary, he intimated that he purposely abstained from charging intent to defraud in the complaint, and that he did not intend to lead direct evidence to establish fraudulent intent; and in these circumstances I sustained the objections, found the complaint irrelevant, and dismissed the respondent from the bar."

The questions of law for the opinion of the Court were—"(1) Is intent to defraud of the essence of the statutory crime and offence charged in this complaint? (2) If so, was it necessary in the circumstances stated to set forth in the complaint that the respondent did what is therein charged with intent to defraud? (3) Is it necessary, in any case, for the appellant to prove fraudulent intent; and if he proved only the statements averred in this complaint, would he be entitled to a conviction?"

Feb. 2, 1891.
Howman v. Mackie.

On 27th October 1890, the case was ordered, in respect of its importance, to be heard before a full bench.

Argued for the appellant;—Section 4 of the Act of 1884 which created the offence contained no proviso as to "intent to defraud." It was true there was a reference in the section to the provisions of the Act of 1880. That reference, however, was quite general, and it was obviously made for the purpose of providing for procedure, and limiting the punishment to be inflicted on conviction. The provision in the 13th section of the Act of 1880 that the accused should escape conviction if he succeeded in proving that he had had no fraudulent intent, was clearly not imported by reference into the Act of 1884. Even if it were held to be imported, it did not impose the burden upon the prosecutor of libelling or proving fraudulent intent. Small v. Hart, supra, was wrongly decided, and the opinions in Duncan v. Cooper, supra, were obiter.

The respondent argued that Small v. Hart was well decided; that the reference in the 1884 Act to the Act of 1880 was unqualified; that the proviso in subdivision A of section 13 of the latter Act was incorporated into the former Act, and that consequently "intent to defraud" ought to have been libelled.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—As this case presents itself it is complicated by numerous circumstances, and among other things by this, that under the Act of 1887 it does not matter whether proof by the prosecutor of intent to defraud be necessary or not, as that is not a question which arises on relevancy. But I think the difficulty goes deeper than that. I think the first question is put in an unfortunate form, and does not call for an answer. The question which we have to consider is, whether it was necessary for the prosecutor, either by direct statement or through the implication of the Act of 1887, to state a case of intent to defraud, and thereby to tie himself up to prove it, and that question is I think embraced by the second and third questions stated for our opinion. Now, I think the second question depends upon the third, because if it be the case that the prosecutor would be entitled to a conviction if he proved only what is set forth, it is plain that he would not require to aver any more in his libel. The case therefore narrows itself down to a consideration of the answer to the third question. That depends upon the meaning and interpretation to be put upon section 4 of the Act of 1884. I do not think it would be possible to set forth in clearer words than is done by this clause the statement of a crime and offence. There is no mention of intent to defraud. To borrow money with intent to defraud would, I think, be a crime at common law, whether the borrower were an undischarged bankrupt or not. It is plain that this clause was intended to create an offence which was not an offence at common law, and that the offence created consists in this, that an undischarged bankrupt gets credit to a greater extent than £20 without revealing that he is an undischarged bankrupt. I do not find anything in the rest of the clause relating at all to the offence. The rest of the clause relates only to the way in which the offender is to be dealt with, and the reference to the previous Act is made for that purpose alone.

I think it right to state that failure to inform the creditor would not in my opinion constitute the offence where the creditor knew that the borrower was undischarged.

One other question arises, and that is, whether the undischarged bankrupt can escape conviction by proving that he had no intent to defraud? That is one of the questions raised by the Sheriff. I do not think that question can possibly enter into the question of relevancy. The Act of 1880 provides with reference to certain offences that the accused is entitled to escape from conviction if, after the facts required by the statute are proved against him, he shall prove that he had no intent to defraud. I think nothing could more plainly bring out the fact that intent to defraud does not need to be averred in these cases, than the fact that disproof of the intent will enable the accused to escape. In these particular cases in section 13 the prosecutor is only called on to prove that the acts were done. The inference stands unless there is disproof. I therefore think that in this question of relevancy we cannot enter into the question whether this would be a good defence to a charge under section 4 of the Act of 1884, but I think it right to express my own opinion that it would not. I think that if the prosecutor proves the two facts, that the prisoner was an undischarged bankrupt, and obtained credit to a greater extent than £20 without informing his creditor that he was an undischarged bankrupt, he has committed the offence set forth in the clause. The permission to prove absence of fraudulent intent in the Act of 1880 applies only to some of the offences enumerated. The reference in the Act of 1884 to the Act of 1880 is quite general, and accordingly I do not see how it can have the effect of attaching such a qualification to the offence created by the Act of 1884.

I therefore think the Sheriff erred in holding the libel irrelevant, and erred also in his mode of reaching that conclusion by asking the prosecutor what he was prepared to prove. In considering relevancy he had no such question before him. To have held the libel relevant would not have precluded him from calling on the prosecutor to prove anything he considered necessary.

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree with your Lordship that in considering this case the first question is, what is the meaning of the statutory prohibition? I think the statute imposes upon an undischarged bankrupt an obligation to disclose to anyone, from whom he is seeking credit to the extent of £20, the fact that he is an undischarged bankrupt. The object evidently is to prevent persons obtaining credit to whom such credit would not be given if the true facts were known. Now the hypothesis of the section is, that the person from whom credit is sought is ignorant of the fact of the borrower's bankruptcy, because, if he were aware of that fact, there could be no necessity for any communication of it, and such a case I agree would be altogether outside the scope of the statute. But on the supposition that the person applied to is ignorant, the obligation to disclose is laid on the bankrupt, and the failure to perform that duty is itself the offence for which the statute imposes the penalty.

So far I think the case is clear, but there does seem to be some doubt and difference of opinion as to whether it was intended, by the general reference to the previous Debtors Act of 1880, to incorporate that part of it in which, in the cases referred to, the debtor is enabled to clear himself by shewing that he had no intention to defraud. I shall have a word to say about that in conclusion.

In the meantime, looking to the questions in the case, it appears to me that it is not necessary to answer the first question at all. On the second and third I think our answer must be in the negative, because it is certainly not necessary under the present form of indictment to set out that there was an intention to defraud, and clearly under the statute it was not necessary for the appellant to lead evidence in support of an intention to defraud.

No. 13.

Feb. 2, 1891.
Howman v. Mackie.

It is right to notice that the question of relevancy now arises under different conditions from those which prevailed when the case of Small v. Hart was decided, because that case was brought under the old common law mode of indictment, and the prosecutor had proceeded on the principle of setting out the statutes at full length, and had omitted the qualification in the Act of 1880. At that time very strict views prevailed regarding the mode of libelling a statute, and I see no reason to doubt that the decision there given on relevancy was well founded according to the views of relevancy which then prevailed, but under the present statute of 1887 a great many things which under the old system had to be set forth are now implied.

There remains only the question, whether the accused would be entitled to acquittal if he proved that there was no intent to defraud? That does not fall under any of the questions put to us, but apparently, in the view of the majority of the Judges who decided Small v. Hart, that would have been a good defence. Your Lordship has indicated a different opinion, and I shall only say that in coming to that conclusion for the purpose of determining the relevancy of Small v. Hart, what weighed with me—and still weighs with me—was that in the interpretation of criminal statutes the leaning always is to the side of freedom. The 13th clause of the Act of 1880 is divided into two parts, A and B. In the offences enumerated in one part the accused is allowed to plead that he had no intention to defraud; in the other no such qualification is expressed. It appeared to me that the reference to the Act of 1880 could only apply to the 13th section, and that the new offence created by the Act of 1884 was one ejusdem generis with those enumerated under head A, and that the words of reference might fairly comprehend the exception there introduced in favour of the accused person. But it is not necessary, nor is it within our power, to give a decision on that point. I only wish to reserve my opinion upon it, which I cannot say has undergone any change since I considered it in Small v. Hart.

Lord Trayner.—I have no doubt in reaching the same conclusion. I think, the relevancy is beyond question. The prosecutor has used the very words of the Act. I also concur in your Lordship's observation as to the impropriety of any Judge disposing of a question of relevancy upon questions put by him as to what the prosecutor intended to prove. I can understand that the Sheriff was a little troubled by the different opinions that were quoted to him in the cases of Cooper, Hart, and Swan, but for my own part I have not experienced any difficulty in coming to a conclusion upon all the three questions put by the Sheriff for our opinion, and I concur in the views which your Lordship in the chair has expressed. Questions two and three go together, because if it be unnecessary to prove fraudulent intent, it follows that it is unnecessary to aver it. That also leads to the result that the answer to the first question would have to be negative, because the statute has not made intent to defraud of the essence of the offence.

There seems to be a difficulty felt by some because of the reference from the Act of 1884 to the Act of 1880. That has not occasioned me any difficulty. The Act of 1884, after describing the particular offence thereby created, adds, that if anyone is guilty of that offence, he shall be dealt with and punished as if he had been guilty of a crime under the Act of 1880, and the provisions of that Act shall apply to the proceedings under this section of the Act of 1884. It is impossible, I think, to read that provision as meaning anything else than that if a man has committed an offence under section 4 of the Act of 1884, you must go back to the Act of 1880 to see how he is to be dealt with, and what is the limit of his punishment. The mode in which he is to be proceeded with is set forth in section 13 of the Act of 1880, and is either before the High Court, before a Sheriff and jury, or before a Sheriff without a jury, and the limit of his punishment is two years or sixty days. I cannot read the reference to the Act of 1880 as having any bearing whatever upon the offence created by the Act of 1884 except as regards procedure and result. I think it is impossible to read the words "unless he proves to the satisfaction of the Court that he had no intent to defraud" as qualifying anything except those enumerated cases which immediately follow them. To read them as a qualification into the Act of 1884 would, I think, be to misread that Act, and to introduce a defence which it does not contemplate.

But even if that view were wrong—and it differs from the views of some other Judges of this Court—that would not affect the judgment in this case, because it relates to defence and not to relevancy. I have thought it right to express my opinion, as your Lordship has done, subject to reconsideration should the question arise directly in any future case.

LORD WELLWOOD.—I agree in the conclusion at which your Lordships have arrived. As regards the matter last touched upon by Lord Trayner I desire to reserve my opinion. If we had only to deal with the Act of 1884 I think all that the prosecutor would have to do would be to set forth the 4th section, and that he would neither require to libel intent to defraud nor to prove it. But then the respondent in the present case maintains that the provisions of section 13 of the Act of 1880 are to be read into this section of the Act of 1884, and in particular the provision in subsection A, to the effect that in each of the cases following the accused is to be deemed guilty "unless he proves to the satisfaction of the Court that he had no intent to defraud." Now, my present impression is, in accordance with the views expressed by your Lordship in the chair and Lord Trayner, that it is impossible to read these words into the Act of 1884, because the reference in the Act of 1884 is general, and does not refer particularly to A or B, and therefore the correct way to read the reference to the Act of 1880 is to refer it to the mode of trial and the punishment to be awarded. But supposing that the respondent was right in maintaining that the provision is to be read in, I do not think that affects the question we have to decide. It would only lead to this, that the accused could demand an acquittal if he proved he had no intent to defraud, but would not lay on the prosecutor any obligation to libel intent to defraud, or to lead evidence upon it.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Having considered the case and heard counsel for the parties, answer the second question in the case and the first part of the third question in the negative, and the latter part of the said third question in the affirmative; reverse the determination of the inferior Judge, and remit to him to proceed according to law."

DUNCAN M'NIVEN (Procurator-Fiscal at Fort-William), Respondent.—Maconochie, A.-D.

Suspension—Irregularity in citation—Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864 (27 and 28 Vict. c. 53)—Schedule F.—A warrant of citation to appear before the Sheriff to answer a complaint under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts was executed by serving a copy of the complaint and of the Sheriff's warrant, but there was no formal citation to appear under the signature of the officer in terms of schedule F of the Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864. The accused appeared at the diet specified in the Sheriff's warrant and was convicted.

In a suspension held that as the accused had appeared at the diet he was barred from founding on the irregularity in the mode of citation.

Suspension—Relevancy—Specification.—Held (following Bolton v. Murdoch, Jan. 23, 1890, 2 White, 410, 17 R. (Just. Cases) 22) that an objection to a complaint on the ground of want of specification of facts of which the accused is entitled to notice, which has not been stated before trial, cannot be entertained by the High Court in a suspension of a conviction on the complaint.

Suspension—Sentence—Award of expenses in sentence suspended.—In a sentence the accused was adjudged to pay a penalty and also a sum of expenses in excess of the amount fixed by statute.

The Court suspended the sentence quoad the award of expenses but quoad ultra allowed the sentence to stand.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Ld. Stormonth Darling. Lord Low. Justiciary Clerk.

DONALD STEWART, Altass, Rosehall, Sutherlandshire, was charged at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal at Fort-William, with an offence against the Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862, upon a complaint under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881, and the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887.

The complaint set forth that he did "on 15th November 1890, traffic in spirits or other exciseable liquors, within a hut or shed, occupied or possessed by him at Achluachrach, without having obtained a certificate in that behalf in terms of the Act (25 and 26 Vict. c. 35) entitled the Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862."

After evidence had been led, the Sheriff-substitute (Simpson) convicted the accused of the contravention charged, and therefore adjudged him to forfeit and pay the sum of £7 of penalty with the sum of £3, 9s. of expenses, &c.

Stewart presented a bill of suspension of the sentence which contained the following statements:—"On 1st December 1890, the respondent as Procurator-fiscal of Court for the public interest, served upon the complainer the above complaint as well as the deliverance or warrant thereon, in which the complainer was cited to appear personally before the Sheriff at Fort-William, upon 11th December 1890, at eleven o'clock forenoon. There was, however, no formal requisition or citation to appear under the signature of the officer in terms of schedule F of the Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864.*

"The complainer was innocent of the offence charged against him, and being strongly of the belief that it could not be proved appeared at the diet mentioned in the warrant, and did not plead want of citation.

Take notice that you are required to appear personally at the place and time specified in the warrant, of which the foregoing is a copy, to answer to the complaint to which this notice is attached, with certification. This I do on the day of (Signature of officer.)"

Stewart v. M'Niven.

"For the same reason he did not plead want of specification in the complaint, in so far as it did not particularly set forth (1) the kind of spirits sold; (2) nor whether the sale was retail or wholesale; nor (3) the person to whom the spirits were sold. The Sheriff in adjudging the complainer to pay £3, 9s. of expenses exceeded the amount which he was entitled to fix under section 4 (a) of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1881."*

Argued for the complainer;—The proceedings were funditus null in respect (1) there was no citation of the complainer under the hand of the Sheriff-officer.[1] (2) The complaint was bad for want of specification. No quantity of liquor was specified as having been sold. Such specification was essential, as, if the quantity was more than two gallons, and sold by a person holding a dealer's licence, there would be no contravention.[2] The complaint did not bear the names and designations of the two persons to whom the liquor was sold.[3] (3) The sentence was in excess of what the Court was entitled to pronounce.[4]

Argued for the respondent;—(1) The objection to citation was too late, as the complainer had appeared on the day named in the Sheriff's warrant. (2) The objections to the specification were not stated before the trial, and could not now be taken.[5] (3) The sentence was not in excess except as regarded the expenses. Where two parts of a sentence were separable, the Court had suspended quoad the part which was excessive only.[6]

LORD STORMONTH DARLING.—The first ground stated for suspending this conviction was that the complainer had not been cited in the form prescribed by schedule F of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, the officer having merely served a copy of the complaint and deliverance thereon. The deliverance contained a note of the place, day, and hour of appearance, but there was no formal requisition to appear under the signature of the officer. This was an irregularity in point of form, but it is impossible to say the complainer was in any way prejudiced thereby, for he appeared at the place and on the day named in the Sheriff's warrant, and having done so, I think he cannot now found upon any irregularity in the mode of citing him.

The second ground of suspension is want of specification in the complaint, in respect that it did not specify the kind of liquor supplied, nor the persons to whom it was sold, though these were known to the prosecutor. I do not know that the prosecutor was bound to tie himself down to the precise kind of liquor, but I certainly think he ought to have named the persons to whom the liquor was sold, these persons being known to him. If the complainer had objected to the complaint on this ground before the Sheriff, and had asked for amendment of the complaint and adjournment of the trial, I do not doubt it would have been the Sheriff's duty to grant his crave.

Feb. 2, 1891. Stewart v. M'Niven.

It is explained in the note of suspension that the complainer refrained from doing so because he was confident of an acquittal, but I do not think an accused person is entitled to take his chance of an acquittal, and then, if convicted, to object to want of notice. I adopt the rule as stated by Lord Shand in the case of Bolton v. Murdoch, 2 White, 410, 17 R. (Just. Cases) 22—and I agree with him in thinking that it ought to be of general application—"That where a complaint contains a statement of an offence committed in regard to which the only objection on the ground of relevancy is that there is a want of specification of certain particular facts of which the accused is entitled to notice, the objection cannot be entertained in the Court of Appeal when it has not been stated in the Court below."

It appears that the Sheriff in adjudging the complainer to pay £3, 9s. of expenses exceeded the amount which he was entitled to fix, and it was stated at the bar that the respondent had tendered repayment of the whole sum of expenses awarded. In these circumstances he maintained that where the parts of a sentence are separate, one part being good, and the other bad for excess, the part which is bad may be quashed and the other sustained. This was the course followed in the cases of Bonthrone v. Renton, 1 White, 279, and Macbeath v. Fraser, 1 White, 286, 14 R. (Just. Cases) 16, and I am of opinion that it is the course which we ought to follow here.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD LOW concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Pass the bill so far as regards the decerniture for expenses complained of: Quoad ultra refuse the bill, and decern."

Sheriff—Process—Small-Debt Court—Litiscontestation—Decree in foro—Rehearing—Small-Debt Act, 1837 (7 *Will. After the report was lodged the pursuer enrolled the case, and intimated the diet to the defender. The defender appeared at the diet, but the pursuer failed to appear, and decree of absolvitor was pronounced in respect of her absence. She obtained a warrant for rehearing under section 16 of the Small-Debt Act, 1837, and on the case being reheard, decree was pronounced in her favour.

Held (per Lord Wellwood) that there had been litiscontestation at the first diet, that the decree of absolvitor was a decree by default and not a decree in absence, that the warrant for rehearing was therefore incompetent, and that the decree for the pursuer must be recalled.

MRS ISABELLA GORDON OR M'NEIL brought an action against her husband in the Small-Debt Court of Lanarkshire, at Glasgow, for the sum of £12, 10s. 6d., restricted to £12, consisting of £5, 4s. of aliment, £1, 1s. 6d. of penalty and interest, all alleged to be due under a mutual agreement of separation, and £6, 5s. of law-agent's expenses.

The case was called upon 14th August 1890, and the Sheriff-substitute

Erskine Murray), both parties being present, before answer remitted to the Auditor of the Sheriff Court to report as to the law and practice with reference to the question whether a husband is bound to pay his wife's agents' expenses in connection with a voluntary agreement to separate, and continued the case sine die.

The Auditor having returned his report, the pursuer enrolled the case on 25th September 1890, and intimated the diet to the defender.

The defender was represented at this diet, but the pursuer was not, and decree of absolvitor was pronounced in respect of her absence.

The pursuer then asked for a warrant under section 16 of the Small-Debt Act, 1837,* to have the case reheard. The defender objected to the competency of the warrant, on the ground that the decree of absolvitor was a decree in foro. The Sheriff-substitute, on 13th October 1890, called the case for rehearing, repelled the objection, and decerned for £9, 10s. and 6s. 11d. of expenses.

The defender thereupon appealed to the Circuit Court of Justiciary at Glasgow.

Argued for the defender;—The warrant for rehearing, under section 16 of the Act, was incompetently granted. The section referred only to proper decrees in absence where no litiscontestation had taken place. There had here been litiscontestation at the first calling of the case on 14th August by the proponing of a defence in regard to the expenses claimed by the pursuer. The decree of absolvitor then of 25th September was a decree in foro.[1] In Montgomery's[2] case, in which it had been held that there had been no litiscontestation, the defender had not been called upon to propone a defence, the case having been continued upon the pursuer's motion in respect his witnesses had not appeared.

Argued for the pursuer;—The decree of 25th September was pronounced in respect of her absence, and the section applied in terms. The case of Worrall could not be regarded as authoritative, for two of the Judges in Montgomery's case expressed opinions contrary to its soundness. In any event it did not apply to the present case. It did not appear from the record of the proceedings that any defence had been proponed.

Lord Wellwood.—I have a distinct recollection of the argument in the case of Montgomery v. Loughran, but I am of opinion that the present case is distinguishable from it. The respondent's counsel has said everything that could be advanced in support of his view and of the import of that case, but I cannot accede to the argument that it is conclusive of the present appeal. In that case we were all satisfied that litiscontestation had not taken place at the first diet. Both parties were stated to have been present, but there was no proof that anything amounting to litiscontestation took place at that diet—no statement even that the defender was called upon to state his defence. All the statement we had as to procedure was this, that the pursuer's witnesses not being present, the pursuer applied for and was granted an adjournment. At the adjourned diet, the defender not being present, decree was pronounced in his absence. The question thus arose, was the decree so obtained a decree in absence or not? It was contended on behalf of the pursuer who got the decree at the adjourned diet that it was not a decree in absence, and he founded strongly on the case of Worrall, 13 R. (Just. Cases) 4. Notwithstanding the decision in that case, the Court held in Montgomery's case that the decree was in substance a decree in absence, because they were satisfied, as I have said, that litiscontestation had not taken place at the first diet. I think the effect of the decision in Montgomery v. Loughran was to overrule the case of Worrall as it is reported, because, so far as appears from the report, it would seem that no more took place at the first diet than in the subsequent case of Montgomery.

But the question I have to consider here is, Can the present case be distinguished from the case of Montgomery? I think that it can and must. We see from the account appended to the summons that the sum claimed, £12, 10s. 6d., restricted to £12, is made up of different items, namely, £5, 4s. due in respect of an annuity or aliment; secondly, a sum of £1, 1s. 6d. of liquidate penalty and interest, payable in terms of an agreement between the spouses to separate; and thirdly, a sum of £6, 5s. to account of expenses incurred by the wife in connection with that agreement, and which it is said the husband had to pay.

Now, the Sheriff remitted that matter—the liability for these expenses—to the Auditor, who thereafter reported. An admission must have been made that the annuity was due, and a question must have arisen in regard to the defender's liability for the expenses which formed part of the sum sued for. Accordingly, on 14th August the Sheriff-substitute, as I have said, before answer remitted the account to the Sheriff Court Auditor to report as to the law and practice as to who should pay the expenses in connection with an agreement made in such circumstances. From the terms of that interlocutor it is plain to my mind that parties at the first diet joined issue in regard to the expenses claimed by the pursuer, and that a defence must have been stated and discussed.

In my opinion that is sufficient to distinguish the present from the case of Montgomery. I am aware that during the advising two of my brethren expressed views which, although not necessary for the decision of the case, would, if well founded, lead to my deciding this appeal in favour of the respondent. Founding on the language of the 13th section of the Small-Debt Act of 1837 they indicated an opinion that if the pursuer or defender is absent, whether at the first or any subsequent diet, and a decree is pronounced in respect of absence, the absent party is entitled to a rehearing under section 16.

With all respect I do not agree in this view. It is not to be readily assumed that after witnesses have been examined and other procedure has taken place one of the parties is entitled to have the proceedings begun de novo on consigning expenses and a sum of five shillings. Now, I think that the 16th section of the statute refers to proper decrees in absence where no procedure amounting to litiscontestation has previously taken place. The 13th section on the other hand deals primarily with cases where "the parties shall appear," and although it contains a provision that if one of the parties is not personally present when judgment is pronounced a charge of ten free days shall be given,—a provision which may apply equally where the decree is one in absence or one by default,—I do not think it is to be inferred that in the Small-Debt Court there can be no such thing as a decree by default as distinguished from a decree in absence. No. 15.

Mar. 5, 1891.
M'Neil v. M'Neil.

I therefore think that in this case the decree of absolvitor was a decree by default and not one in absence, and that the pursuer was not entitled to be reponed against it. I therefore sustain the appeal, and modify the expenses to three guineas.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, recalled the decree or judgment complained of, and assoilzied the appellant from the conclusion of the summons referred to.

Cruelty to animals—Dishorning cattle—Cruelty to Animals (Scotland) Act, 1850 (13 and 14 Vict. c. 92), sec. 1.—In a complaint against a cattle-dealer for a contravention of the Cruelty to Animals (Scotland) Act, 1850,* alleged to have been committed in the dishorning of cattle, by sawing off their horns close to the skull, it was proved that the operation caused great pain to the animals operated upon, but that it was in common use over a large district in Scotland. It was further proved that the object and effect of the operation were to prevent the cattle from injuring each other when fed in courts, and that the operation had been skilfully performed.

Held that no offence had been committed under the statute.

Expenses—Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864 (27 and 28 Vict. c. 53), sec. 22—Cruelty to Animals (Scotland) Act, 1850 (13 and 14 Vict. c. 92), sec. 8.—The Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864, sec. 22, provides that in complaints brought under the Act "for the recovery of any penalty . . . expenses shall not be awarded to or against any public prosecutor or party prosecuting under the authority of any Act of Parliament for the public interest, unless such award of expenses is authorised by such Act." The Cruelty to Animals (Scotland) Act, 1850, by section 8, provides that in every case of a conviction under the Act, where the sum imposed as a penalty, together with costs (if any) awarded by the magistrate, "is not paid within a certain time," the magistrate may adjudge the offender to be imprisoned.

In a complaint under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881, for a penalty incurred by a contravention of the Cruelty to Animals (Scotland) Act, 1850, it was held (1) that there was in section 8 of the latter Act an implied power to the Judge in the inferior Court to award expenses against the accused, and therefore, (2) that it was competent to award expenses against the prosecutor.

THIS was a complaint brought in the Sheriff Court of the Lothians and Peebles, at Haddington, under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881, and the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, at the instance of Thomas Todrick, Procurator-fiscal of Court, against George Wilson, cattle-dealer, Cupar-Fife.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Ld. M'Laren. Lord Trayner. Ld. Wellwood. Ld. Kyllachy. Justiciary Clerk.

The complaint set forth that the accused, "on 20th November 1889, did, within a cattle-court at the farm steading of North Berwick Abbey,

* The Cruelty to Animals (Scotland) Act, 1850, by sec. 1, enacts,—"Whereas it is expedient to prevent wanton cruelty in the treatment of horses, cattle, and other domestic animals in Scotland, be it therefore enacted . . . that any person who shall from and after the passing of this Act cruelly beat, ill-treat, overdrive, abuse, or torture, or cause or procure to be cruelly beaten, ill-treated, overdriven, abused, or tortured, any animal, shall be guilty of an offence."

in the parish of North Berwick and county of Haddington, cruelly ill-treat, abuse, or torture, or cause or procure to be cruelly ill-treated, abused, or tortured, thirty-two or thereby oxen, by sawing off with a saw or other instrument the horns of the said thirty-two oxen, close to their skulls, whereby the said thirty-two oxen were subjected to great unnecessary and cruel pain and suffering, and were thus cruelly ill-treated, abused, or tortured, or caused or procured to be cruelly ill-treated, abused, or tortured, by the said George Wilson, contrary to the Act 13 and 14 Vict. cap. 92, and particularly section 1 thereof, whereby the said respondent was liable to the penalties particularly set forth in the complaint."

After a proof, the Sheriff-substitute (Shirreff) assoilzied the accused, and refused a motion by his counsel that the Procurator-fiscal be found liable in expenses.

The fiscal took a case, in which the Sheriff-substitute stated the following facts as held proved by him:—"In consequence of complaints by the cattlemen in charge of the animals, to the effect that they were preventing each other from taking their food, and injuring each other, it was resolved to dishorn them. The cattle were mostly eighteen months old. They were dishorned by the respondent, with the assistance of four of the farm servants at the Abbey farm, at the time and place libelled. Each animal was drawn by a rope to a pillar in the cattle-court. Its legs were secured by straps connected by a rope, and the animal was cast upon its side upon a bed of straw. The horns were then sawn off by the respondent as close to the skull as possible with a fine tenor saw. The skin at the base of the horn was in some cases cut with a knife after the saw had passed through the horn, and skin remained attached to it, and in some cases also the skin was cut through before sawing in order to clear a way for the saw. The operation caused a considerable amount of bleeding, some blood squirting out from the wound when the horn was cut off. The respondent, immediately after the operation, applied a balsam to the wound. The sawing off of the horns occupied a few seconds in the case of each horn, and caused considerable pain. The sinuses of the head in each case were exposed, and atmospheric air was drawn into the sinuses, and expelled therefrom at each movement of respiration. Some of the animals commenced to eat immediately after the operation, but they had not been fed that morning; others did not eat. After four or five days, there was considerable inflammation and consequent discharge of pus in the case of some of the animals. Some were unable to eat, being in a state of fever, and evidently suffering considerable pain. With the exception of applying a little balsam, as above stated, no treatment followed the operation. The animals operated upon were afterwards more manageable than before, and ultimately they put on flesh and throve well. It was further proved that in England and Wales, in Berwickshire and Roxburghshire, total dishorning was not practised, unless for surgical purposes, and that in East Lothian total dishorning was only carried out to a limited extent. The witnesses for the prosecution, who were in the habit of feeding cattle in courts, found that the objects which total dishorning was intended to attain were met either by separating the vicious and weak animals, or by cutting off a portion from the point of the horn, but so as not to open the sinuses. It was proved that the total dishorning of cattle was regularly practised by farmers and breeders of cattle in Fifeshire, Perthshire, Forfarshire, Kinross-shire, and Kincardineshire. The object for which the operation was performed was the safety of the animals feeding in cattle-courts, which frequently suffered painful and serious injuries from goring and butting, the weaker animals being often prevented from feeding by the stronger, when the horns were allowed to remain. It was the opinion of the witnesses for the defence that it was impossible to feed cattle in open courts unless they were dishorned, and that as the importation of Irish and Canadian cattle (the breeds mainly fed in the before-mentioned counties), which were more inclined to be troublesome than other breeds, had increased with recent years, dishorning was now more necessary than formerly. Partial dishorning, which some of the witnesses for the defence had tried, had been found unsatisfactory. It was further proved that the respondent had considerable experience in dishorning cattle, and that the operation on the cattle in question had been performed with skill, and in the usual manner."

The question of law for the opinion of the High Court of Justiciary was,—"Do the facts as above set forth infer a contravention of the Act 16 and 14 Vict. c. 92?"

On 14th July 1890 the Lords Commissioners of Justiciary remitted to the Sheriff-substitute to state what were his findings in fact, if any, on the evidence referred to in the following paragraphs of the stated case:—"The witnesses for the prosecution, who were in the habit of feeding cattle in courts, found that the objects which total dishorning was intended to attain were met either by separating the vicious and weak animals, or by cutting off a portion from the point of the horn, but so as not to open the sinuses; and 'it was the opinion of the witnesses for the defence that it was impossible to feed cattle in open courts unless they were dishorned, and that as the importation of Irish and Canadian cattle (the breeds mainly fed in the before-mentioned courts), which were more inclined to be troublesome than other breeds, had increased with recent years, dishorning was now more necessary than formerly. Partial dishorning, which some of the witnesses for the defence had tried, had been found unsatisfactory.'—The said Sheriff-substitute to report to this Court quam primum."

The Sheriff-substitute on 17th July reported that "he was of opinion at the trial of the cause that it was proved that when cattle fed in courts are troublesome, total dishorning, which effectually prevents them from injuring each other, is for the benefit of the cattle. That other ways of dealing with troublesome animals, viz., by fastening wooden balls to the tips of the horns, and partial dishorning, do not so effectually prevent cattle from injuring each other."

Argued for the appellant;—The operation fell within the words of the statute. It was not necessary to shew that the respondent's act was "wanton." It was sufficient if there was the infliction of great pain for an object which could have been otherwise attained by painless means. The Sheriff-substitute stated that "tipping" the horns was an operation which accomplished the desired object. It might not be so effectual as total dishorning, but the advantage gained by the latter mode was out of all proportion to the pain inflicted.[1] In Callaghan's[2] case, the judgment of the Court which sanctioned the operation was based upon a finding that the advantages attainable by the practice were vastly out of proportion to the pain inflicted thereby, provided the operation was skilfully performed.

Argued for the respondent;—The object of the statute was to prevent "wanton cruelty." The operation could not be said to be of this nature. It was skilfully conducted so as to reduce pain to a minimum. It was for the benefit of the cattle, and was extensively performed over a large area in Scotland.[1] Ford v. Wiley was inapplicable. The judgment there proceeded upon the view that it was proved in evidence that dishorning was neither necessary nor customary in England.

At advising,—

LORD M'LAREN.—This is an appeal in the form of a case stated under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act from a sentence of absolvitor pronounced by the Sheriff-substitute at Haddington in a complaint at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal of the county charging the respondent with a contravention of the Act 13 and 14 Vict. c. 92, passed for the prevention of cruelty to animals. In a previous complaint against the same respondent—Renton v. Wilson—it was determined that the dishorning of cattle performed in circumstances set forth in the case did not amount to a contravention of the statute. In a case which afterwards came before the High Court of Justice in England, a Court consisting of the Lord Chief-Justice and Mr Justice Hawkins, they came to a contrary conclusion on the facts laid before them, and the case which we are now to decide was instituted, as I understand, with the view of having the question of the legality of dishorning considered by a Court differently constituted, and consisting of a greater number of Judges. I may observe in the outset that the question put to us is not very well devised for the purpose of obtaining a decision on any general proposition, because the terms of the question are, Do the facts, as above set forth, infer a contravention of the statute? It is necessary, however, that we should endeavour to generalise these facts—so far as the Sheriff's findings enable us to do so—in order that we may compare the act done with the description of acts prohibited by the statute. The operation of dishorning, as performed by the respondent on thirty-two cattle, is described somewhat minutely in the case, and it is not necessary that I should occupy time by reading the description. The operation consists in sawing off the horns with a fine saw close to the sinuses of the head, and it is evident that in this case the operation was not only very painful during the few seconds which sufficed for its performance, but that it was the cause of prolonged pain and distress to the animals until their wounds were healed. So much is found by the Sheriff-substitute, who also finds that the respondent had considerable experience in dishorning cattle, and that the operation on the cattle in question was performed with skill and in the usual manner.

It may also be taken as proved that dishorning makes the cattle more valuable to the owner. This might perhaps be assumed, as it is not to be supposed that stock farmers would be in the habit of inflicting torture on their cattle without motive. But it is found in the case that the animals after being operated upon became more manageable than before, and that eventually they put on flesh and throve well.

It appeared to us, when we first considered the case, that the findings of the Sheriff-substitute were not sufficiently specific as to two points, which are indicated in our interlocutor of 14th July remitting the case to the Sheriff-substitute for further findings on these points. The report of the Sheriff-substitute is quite explicit on both the points referred, and is in these terms:—(His Lordship quoted the terms of the report). The facts being as stated, we have now to consider whether the dishorning of cattle, when performed with skill and in the usual manner, for the purpose and with the effect of preventing the animals from injuring one another, is an offence under the statute.

It is plain enough that the restraining effect of the statute does not amount to a universal prohibition of operations which cause pain to the lower animals, irrespective of the motives of the operator and of the objects sought to be attained. The cases of surgical operations, and the pain and punishment inflicted in the training of domestic animals, are instances to the contrary, and it appears from the preamble to the Scottish statute that the thing which the Legislature meant to prevent was the infliction of "wanton cruelty"—that is, as I understand, purposeless cruelty. I am far from saying that legislation may not very properly be directed against the infliction of pain for purposes which are inadequate, though not unlawful or immoral; and we know, for example, that the performance of painful experiments on animals for the mere instruction of the operator is prohibited absolutely, while the performance of such experiments for the purposes of proper scientific research is subjected to certain restrictions, which I do not stop to specify. What we have here to consider is not the question of the expediency of prohibiting dishorning of cattle, but whether the practice is prohibited as being included in the general enacting words of the statute libelled. The offence prohibited is the cruelly ill-treating, abusing, or torturing of animals. These words must be construed according to the ordinary use of language, because they contain nothing that is technical. Comparing them with the facts as found by the Sheriff-substitute, I am of opinion—an opinion in which I believe your Lordships are agreed—that the language of the statute is not in fair and just construction applicable to the case of the operation of dishorning when performed with skill, and for the legitimate purpose of preventing the cattle from injuring one another. It is of course open to anyone to say that total dishorning is unnecessary for the purpose in view, and that partial dishorning, or some mechanical expedient—such as tipping the horns—might be found to answer the purpose equally well. If I were sitting as a juryman with the evidence of experts before me, it is possible that I might take this view; I should certainly have a leaning towards the view that dishorning as practised by sawing off the horns close to the skull is not necessary. But sitting as a member of the Court of Appeal, I must take the facts as they are found by the Sheriff, because under the constitution of this Court we cannot review a sentence of any kind on the merits, but only on questions of law arising on the facts as stated in the case.

In the argument addressed to us at the rehearing on the amended case, all the authorities bearing on the interpretation of the Cruelty to Animals Acts were brought before us; but with the exception of the English case of Ford v. Wiley, and the case of Renton v. Wilson in this Court, I cannot say that the previous decisions throw much light on this question.

I am sure that on a question of statute law all your Lordships are disposed to give the greatest weight to the decision of a co-ordinate English Court, and I have certainly no desire to criticise in any way the opinions of the very eminent Judges by whom the case of Ford v. Wiley was decided. Indeed, I am not sure that I should dissent from the reasoning or the conclusions embodied in those opinions as applicable to the case before the English Court, because I observe that the learned Judges had agreed, on the evidence before them, in holding it proved that the operation of dishorning was neither necessary nor customary in England. In their view of the facts, dishorning is treated as a purely experimental proceeding, not productive of benefit to the owners of the animals, and a cause of needless and therefore cruel suffering to the animals themselves. I need hardly repeat that the facts as laid before us point to a very different conclusion, and while our decision is necessarily different in its legal consequences from the decision of the Supreme Court in England, it does not appear to me that there is any fundamental difference in the principles of interpretation which have been applied by the Courts of England and Scotland to the construction of this statute. These principles are very fully expounded in the opinion delivered by Lord Young in the case of Renton, in which I concurred at the time, and I may be allowed to add that I see no reason to recede from anything said by myself on that occasion. I of course assume, in accordance with the Sheriff-substitute's findings, that the dishorning was performed with skill and without the infliction of unnecessary pain. Under these conditions, I am of opinion that the respondent has not rendered himself liable to a criminal prosecution, and that the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute ought to be affirmed.

LORD TRAYNER.—The question submitted for our judgment is one of importance, and I have carefully considered the argument addressed to us as well as the whole cases cited by the parties. I am of opinion that the case of Renton v. Wilson was rightly decided, and concur in the opinions expressed by Lords Young and M'Laren in deciding that case. I do not think it necessary to go over the various cases in which conflicting decisions on a similar question have been pronounced in England and Ireland, but content myself with saying that the reasons given for the judgment in Ford v. Wiley (so far as not based upon the particular facts there found proved) seem to me inadequate and inconclusive, while the judgment in Lewis v. Fermor appears, on the other hand, to be well founded both in sense and law. I am therefore of opinion that the question before us should be answered in the negative.

LORD WELLWOOD.—What we are asked by the appellant to decide practically is, that the dishorning of cattle is in all circumstances illegal, and an offence against the Act 13 and 14 Vict. cap. 92, section 1. The question which is submitted to us is one of law and not of fact. We must take the facts from the Sheriff-substitute, and we can only decide in favour of the appellant if the facts so found infer in our opinion a contravention of the Act.

Now, the Sheriff-substitute finds that the operation was skilfully performed; that it effectually prevents the animals from injuring each other, and is for the benefit of the cattle; and that other remedies suggested do not so effectually prevent cattle from injuring each other. In this state of the facts he has acquitted the respondent.

Now, in order to a conviction of cruelty in the sense of the Act, I think there must be evidence of wanton cruelty in the sense of pain inflicted without reasonable and adequate cause. I do not think that mere bona fides on the part of the operator is of itself a sufficient defence, but if there is bona fides, and if the object is reasonable, a broad view of the matter must be taken, and the question of adequacy or inadequacy should not depend on the individual views of the Judge as to propriety of the act or operation. In order to justify conriction the inadequacy of the object must, I think, be such as would lead any reasonable and humane man capable of weighing evidence to hold that the pain inflicted was out of all proportion to the object in view. On the facts stated I cannot hold that the Sheriff-substitute's decision is wrong; on the contrary, I think it is right.

As to the previous cases, I agree with Lord Trayner in preferring the grounds of judgment in Renton v. Wilson and the English case of Lewis v. Fermor to the judgment of the Court in the later case of Ford v. Wiley. In the last named case the facts on which the Justices of Norfolk dismissed the information were practically the same as those in the present case, and if those facts were correctly found by them, I am humbly of opinion that their decision (which was reversed by the Queen's Bench Division) was right. It appears from the report that the learned Judges in the Queen's Bench Division took a different view of the evidence from that on which the Justices proceeded, but even on the facts as set forth in the opinions of the Judges, I should not have been prepared to agree in the result at which they arrived.

I therefore think that we should answer the question put to us in the negative.

Lord Kyllachy.—I agree with all your Lordships that the facts of this case as now found by the Sheriff-substitute leave really no room for doubt as to the propriety of the Sheriff's judgment. He finds as matter of fact—and we must assume, correctly—that this operation of which we have heard so much is not merely useful in the interest of the owner of the cattle, but is also useful and even necessary in the interest of the beasts themselves. In these circumstances it is plainly impossible to affirm that the operation is one which comes within the scope of the statute, unless indeed it is to be held—which nobody has suggested—that the statutory offence is committed by the mere infliction of pain.

I therefore concur in the previous judgment of this Court in the case of Renton v. Wilson, and I am unable to agree with the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench in the case of Ford v. Wiley. At the same time, with respect to the general question of the purpose and constitution of the statute, I should like to say this—that I am not disposed to quarrel with the definition or rather test proposed in the English judgment, according to which the question always is whether the pain inflicted on the animal is inflicted for an adequate object, and is no more than necessary for that object. I confess that as an abstract statement that strikes me as correct enough. The objection to it is that for practical purposes it does not much advance the argument. Because the question always is, Who is to judge of the adequacy of the object? Is the reference to be to the mind and judgment of the accused, or to the opinion of the Judge who tries the case, or to that of the Court of Appeal, or to the general sense of the community as indicated, for example, by established custom. You must, in short, determine what is to be your standard of adequacy. And it is at that point—as it seems to me—that the real difficulty exists. And it is a difficulty which does not perhaps admit of being quite satisfactorily solved. Each case must largely depend on its own circumstances. For my own part, all that I should be disposed to say is, that the statute is not contravened by the infliction of pain for an object which a man of ordinary humanity might reasonably consider adequate, the operation, whatever it is, being performed in a proper manner, and with a due regard to the infliction of as little pain as possible. It is not, however, necessary for the purposes of the present case to lay down any general principle. It is enough that upon the facts as found by the Sheriff-substitute, and upon any construction of the statute which has been or can be reasonably suggested, the operation here complained of was not within the statute.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—As your Lordships are aware, I have no vote in deciding this case unless there should be an equality of opinion among your Lordships, when I have a casting vote in order to make a majority. Your Lordships are all agreed as to what the judgment in this case should be, and there is therefore no duty upon me to express my opinion, but in the circumstances I may be allowed to say that the view I take of the case is entirely in consonance with the opinions which your Lordships have expressed. Where pain is inflicted, it may be inflicted as deliberate and wanton cruelty for no purpose at all except for the infliction of pain. There may also be the infliction of pain for another purpose altogether, not of cruelty, but still so inflicted as to amount to an offence against the statute. It is quite plain that the verdict in such a case must be a verdict of opinion, not of opinion whether certain facts are proved, but whether certain facts being proved, cruelty in the sense of the statute had been established as matter of opinion. I agree in the opinions expressed by your Lordships, that that can only be decided by the opinion, the reasonable opinion, of ordinary humane men, or of a jury, if such a question could come before a jury on the facts.

It appears to me that where we are dealing with a case of pain undoubtedly inflicted, not for a wanton and cruel purpose, but for the ultimate purpose of advantage to the owner of an animal, or to the animal itself, or to both, three elements must be present to free the party from a charge of cruelty under the Act. In the first place, the purpose must be reasonable; in the second place, the mode of carrying out the purpose must be a reasonable mode; and in the third place, I think the manner of carrying out the operation under that mode must be reasonable. But all these questions are questions of fact. As regards the first, the fact that it possibly improved the value of the animal itself—improved its marketable value—may be a reasonable purpose. I think that prevention of injury to other animals with which it is enclosed may also be a reasonable purpose. As regards the mode adopted of carrying it out, I do not think there is any suggestion that the mode of carrying it out in this case was not as skilful as could be, and therefore reasonable, if the act of removing horns was to be effected. Lastly, as to the manner of carrying it out in this particular case, I think that not only was the mode adopted skilful, but the mode in which it was carried out by the operator was skilful, and therefore it appears to me we have all the three elements, one of which must be negatived before a case of infliction of pain could be shewn for which there could be a conviction. I think the findings of the Sheriff-substitute amount to this, that the accused here did with skill in the usual manner an operation customary, and which has not been pronounced illegal, but on the contrary, has been pronounced legal by the Supreme Court in Scotland.

I therefore entirely concur in thinking that the acquittal by the Sheriff-substitute on the facts he found proved was right.

Counsel for the respondent moved the Court for expenses in this Court and in the Sheriff Court.

Process—Proof—Commission—Form of commission for the examination of a lunatic in a foreign country.—Riddell raised a process of divorce against his wife for adultery with one Weegman. The Lord Ordinary granted decree, and the defender reclaimed. She asked for a commission to examine the alleged paramour Weegman, who was at this time in New South Wales, and was confined in an asylum for the insane. The Court granted the commission in these terms, viz.:—"To take the examination of Eugene Weegman, who is now or lately was an inmate of the Hospital for the Insane, Callan Park, Balmain, near Sydney, New South Wales, provided always that the said commissioner is satisfied that the said Eugene Weegman is mentally fit to be examined; appoint said examination to take place on interrogatories and cross-interrogatories to be adjusted by the Clerk of Court, and appoint the said commissioner, before proceeding to take the said examination, to satisfy himself by all proper evidence that the said Eugene Weegman is mentally fit to be examined."

Superior and Vassal—Prescription—Possession.—The vassal in possession of certain lands, held under a lord of erection, in 1818 obtained from the Crown a charter of confirmation, and in 1841 a charter of resignation and confirmation, which bore that the lands were to be holden of the Sovereign as immediate lawful superior,—coming in place of the monastery and abbey of Melrose by virtue of the Acts of Annexation,—for a reddendo of 10s. Scots, payable to the Crown or its donatory, the lord of erection. The vassal for the prescriptive period paid to the lord of erection £3, 10s. Scots, which was the reddendo stipulated in a charter of the lands granted in 1627 by the lord of erection, and on which various writs by progress had followed down to 1776. No vassal had entered with the lord of erection, as superior, after 1776. The lord of erection having raised an action against the vassal for payment of a casualty, as having been impliedly entered with him as superior in 1874, the vassal pleaded that he had prescribed a right to hold of the Crown, and explained the payment made by him as being a payment to the donatory of the Crown under the crown charter. The discrepancy between the sum actually paid and the reddendo in that charter he explained by producing a correspondence in 1866 between the agents of the parties, from which it appeared that a question having then been raised as to whether the reddendo was £3, 10s. or 10s. Scots annually, the vassal agreed to pay the larger sum rather than raise any question. From that correspondence it appeared that the pursuer's agents were then made aware of the existence of the crown charter, and claimed the payments as due to their client as lord of erection and donatory of the Crown, not as feudal superior.

Held that the vassal had by prescription obtained right to hold of the Crown, and must be assoilzied.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Kinnear.

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH raised an action in the statutory form for payment of a casualty of a year's rent against John Boyd of Maxpoffle, on the footing of his having been entered with his Grace, as superior of these lands, by the operation of the Statute of 1874.

The Duke, who claimed to be superior of the lands as representing the lord of erection of Melrose, in setting forth his title to the superiority, stated that in 1627 the Earl of Haddington, who was then in right of the superiority as lord of erection, granted a charter to Nicolas Carncroce of these lands, the reddendo being in these terms, viz.:—"Reddendo annuatim pro dictis quinque mercatis terrarum de Maxpoppill summam trium librarum sex solidorum et 8d. et trium solidorum et 4d. in augmentatione rentalis monetae prescriptae ad terminos antedictos per prefatas equales portiones."

The pursuer further averred;—The lands were transmitted through a series of proprietors, who made up their titles by precept of clare constat, until, in 1771, they were conveyed to one James Newbigging, who was infeft, and obtained a charter of confirmation from the Duke of Buccleuch, in right of the superiority, in 1776. There had been no entry with the superior since that date.

In 1807 Newbigging sold the lands to Scott of Raeburn, who obtained from the Crown a charter of confirmation in 1818. The charter bore that the lands were to be held "de nobis nostrisque regiis successoribus ut devenientibus in loco Monasterii et Abbatiae de Melrose per Abolitionem Religionis Papalis in Scotia et secundum deditionem terrarum ecclesiasticarum et actorum annexationis in feudifirma feodo et haereditate pro perpetuo"; and the reddendo was thus expressed:—"Reddendo inde annuatim nobis nostrisq. regiis successoribus immediatis legitimis superioribus earundem aut nostris Donatoribus erecti Dominii de Melrose aut illis jus habentibus ex iisdem summam sex solidorum et octo denariorum monetae Scotiae et trium solidorum et quatuor denariorum in augmentationem rentalis."

After various transmissions the lands came into the hands of William Bissett, who, in 1841, obtained a charter of confirmation and resignation from the Crown, with the same tenendas and reddendo as in that of 1818. Bissett disponed on 25th September 1849 to John Boyd, who took infeftment on the precept contained in the crown charter of 1841, and on his death in 1861 John Boyd, the defender of the action, was served heir in special to his father, John Boyd.

The Duke averred, with reference to the crown charters,—"The said charter was obtained from the Crown outwith the knowledge of the then Duke of Buccleuch, the true superior, and under error as to the true state of the facts. The pursuer did not know that the said crown charters had been granted until the present claim was made."

The defender answered,—"The pursuer or his predecessors have for many years, and at least for a time beyond the prescriptive period, been aware of the existence of the said crown charters. During the whole time no objection has been made to them by the pursuer or his predecessors, nor has any such claim of superiority as is now alleged been made by them."

To explain the granting of the crown charters the defender referred (1) to the Statute 1587, c. 29, whereby all kirk lands and superiorities of kirk lands were, with a few exceptions, which had already been erected into lordships and baronies, annexed to the Crown; (2) to the Statute 1633, c. 10, whereby the superiorities of all such lordships were annexed to the Crown, reserving to the lords of erection "the feu-maills and feu-fermes of their said superiorities"; and (3) the Statute 1661, c. 53, confirming the foregoing Act. It also enacted that the vassals of all lands mentioned in the said Acts might hold of the lords of erection, but that they should be entitled to recur to the Crown as their lawful superior, and to be entered as crown vassals, unless they had renounced that right by an act of consent, amounting to a resignation of their right to hold under the Crown.

The defender explained, if it were necessary for him to offer any explanation as to the foundation of his prescriptive title, that the crown charter had been applied for in the exercise of this latter right.

Besides the question of prescription, on which alone the Court gave judgment, and which alone is here reported, the question was debated whether the defender had any right to recur to the Crown or not, it being maintained that the lands in question never were kirk lands, or, in any event, that the defender had elected to hold of the lord of erection, and so renounced his right to recur to the Crown.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The pursuer, being superior of the lands and others described in the summons, and not having received any casualty in respect of the infeftment and consequent implied entry of the defender, is entitled to decree as concluded for. (3) The pursuer is, in any event, entitled to decree against the defender for payment of such sum as the Court shall fix to be the amount of the casualty exigible by him, with expenses of process. (6) The crown charters of 1818 and 1841 having been granted without the knowledge of the pursuer or his predecessors, and the defender and his predecessors not having possessed the lands in virtue thereof, the pursuer's rights cannot be affected thereby. (7) The proprietors of Maxpoffle having for nearly two centuries recognised the pursuer's predecessors as their superior, were not thereafter entitled to revert to the Crown.

The defender pleaded;—(3) Prescription. (4) The defender being entered with the Crown in virtue of the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874, he is not indebted to the pursuer in the casualty sued for. (5) The defender and his predecessors never having renounced their right to enter with the Crown as their lawful superior, they were entitled to do so by means of the crown charters produced and founded upon.

No proof was led, but it was admitted that the Duke and his predecessors had, notwithstanding the crown charters, continued to receive all along £3, 10s. Scots, and not 10s. The receipts granted by his Grace bore to be for "feu-duty" payable to the Duke.

On the other hand, a correspondence was produced by the defender's agent, which had passed between the country agents of the Duke, Messrs Oliver of Hawick, and Mr Fyfe, S.S.C., Mr Boyd's agent in 1866-7. Messrs Oliver had requested payment of £2, 0s. 10d. as seven years' arrears of feu-duty at the rate of 5s. 10d. (i.e., £3, 10s. Scots) per annum, and in May 1866 Mr Fyfe wrote,—"Would you be so good as explain how this feu-duty arises, for Maxpoffle is held of the Crown? Is it a payment to the Duke as lord of erection, or in what character?"

No answer to this letter was received, and in October 1867 a renewed application for feu-duty having been made, Mr Fyfe wrote again,—"I examined the crown charter to-day again with Mr Boyd, and find the feu-duty payable by Mr Boyd to the Crown or to those having right as lord of erection of the lordship of Melrose of 6s. 8d. Scots money, and 3s. 4d. Scots in augmentation of the rental. If you can give me any satisfactory explanation of the claim, Mr Boyd is quite ready to settle."

Messrs Oliver then replied,—"The annual feu-duty is 5s. 10d. stg., and it has been regularly paid by the proprietor for the last one hundred years at least, and is due to his Grace as lord of erection of Melrose. We cannot explain about the sums of Scots money you mention, but there should have been in the charters a reservation of the 5s. 10d. stg. payable to the Duke. It is possible that the reservation may have been omitted in Mr Boyd's charter, but the Duke cannot suffer from this, as he is no party to the granting of it." They then went on to say that, if the matter was to be further investigated it must be through the Duke's Edinburgh agents.

Upon this Mr Fyfe intimated that, rather than trouble the Duke or his agent about so trifling a matter Mr Boyd would pay the 5s. 10d. sterling. He accordingly continued to do so.

The Lord Ordinary (Kinnear), on 30th November 1889, assoilzied the defender.*

* "OPINION.— . . . Now, it appears to me very clear, according to the pursuer's statement of the titles, that the defender is duly entered with the Crown.

"The statement is that in 1807 James Newbigging conveyed the lands to William Scott of Raeburn, who obtained from the Crown a charter of confirmation, dated the 21st, and written to the seal and registered the 30th of December 1818, and from that time the lands have been held directly of the Crown. After a number of transmissions they came into the hands of William Bisset, who obtained a crown charter of confirmation and resignation in 1841, and without taking infeftment conveyed the lands to the defender's father, the late John Boyd. Mr Boyd completed his title by taking infeftment on the open precept contained in the crown charter of 1841; and upon his death in 1861 the defender completed his title by expeding and recording a decree of special and general service as eldest son and heir of line to his father. All that remained for the defender to do, in order to complete his title under the Crown, was to obtain a crown charter or writ of confirmation, and that has now been done by force of the Act of 1874, to the same effect as if an actual charter had been granted. It cannot be maintained that, in that state of the titles, the Act operated to enter the defender with the pursuer, because the lands have been held by the successive proprietors upon crown titles since 1818. The proprietor is entered by the statute to the same effect as if the superior had granted a writ of confirmation according to the law and practice existing at the date of the Act. There can be no doubt that the Crown could have confirmed the defender's sasine, or that he must have obtained a charter for that purpose if he had applied for it, and it is equally certain that no valid confirmation could have been granted except by the Crown. As the titles stood in 1874, a charter or writ of confirmation by the pursuer, assuming him to have been the true superior, would have been altogether inept and ineffectual. The defender therefore is not entered with the pursuer, and I do not think it doubtful that he is duly entered with the Crown. . . .

"The first crown title to which the defender traces his right is the charter of confirmation under the Great Seal of 1818, already mentioned, by which King George III. confirms the disposition by James Newbigging to Scott of Raeburn and Raeburn's sasine in the lands of Maxpoffle, which are to be held of the King and his royal successors as come 'in the place of the Monastery and Abbacy of Melrose, by the abolition of the papal religion and the Act of Annexation,' for payment to the King and his successors, as immediate lawful superiors of the Duke of Buccleuch v. Boyd.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The Lord Ordinary was wrong, for although no doubt the crown charter was a good foundation for pre-lands, or to the King's donatory of the erected lordship of Melrose, of six shillings and eightpence and three and fourpence yearly; and under this charter, and by the progress of titles following upon it, the lands have undoubtedly been held by Scott of Raeburn, and his successors, including the defender, ever since. The pursuer alleges that the charter of 1818 was granted a non habente potestatem, because his ancestor was at that time the true and undoubted superior, under the Crown. The defender concedes that his lands were at one time held of the Dukes of Buccleuch and their predecessors. But he maintains that they were kirk lands, as appears from the terms of the charter itself; and, therefore, that the vassals, for whatever time they had held of the lords of erection, were entitled to recur to the Crown and to be entered as crown vassals. There can be no question as to the general rule upon which the defender founds; and, therefore, if the facts asserted by the charter are true, or if they are to be accepted without inquiry, the title is unimpeachable. The charter asserts that the lands were held of the Abbacy of Melrose, by the predecessor of the vassal infeft; and it assumes that the superiority has come into the hands of a lord of erection, and in that situation the King asserts the right of entering the vassal immediately of the Crown itself, for payment of a feu-duty to the lords of erection. The title is therefore ex facie perfectly valid. But it is said to be ineffectual because an investigation of the prior titles will shew that the lands were not in fact in the situation alleged. The pursuer does not dispute the general law as to the right of Church vassals. But he maintains that it is inapplicable on two grounds, first, because the defender's predecessors in the dominium utile were not Church vassals but subfeuars; and, secondly, because the Statutes of 1633 and 1661, upon which the right to hold of the Crown depends, cannot be made applicable to the lands in question, because of the special terms of the Act of 1609, by which the Abbacy of Melrose was erected into a temporal lordship in favour of the pursuer's predecessor, Lord Haddington. Both of these points would have required serious consideration if the question had been open. But as the case stands, I do not think it necessary or proper to decide them, because I think all such questions are excluded by the defenders' title and possession. I am not satisfied that the pursuers' argument is sound upon either point; but, whatever weight might have been due to it otherwise, it is irrelevant, because, since the crown charter of 1818 has been followed by an uninterrupted possession, the defender has acquired a prescriptive right, which cannot now be challenged on the ground of any defect of power or right in the crown to grant the charter. When prescription has run, there is a presumption of law which cannot be redargued, that a title which is habile in form was also good and valid in substance. It is incompetent, therefore, to go beyond the charter in order to discuss, upon extrinsic grounds, the merits of the right which the Crown alleges as justifying the grant. The case of the Duke of Buccleuch v. Cunynghame, 5 S. 57, appears to me to be directly in point. In the case of the Lord Advocate v. Graham, 7 D. 183, this was referred to as a very strong case indeed, because of its deciding the exact point which the pursuer raises in the present case. 'It was not,' says the Lord Justice-Clerk, 'the case of a party onerously acquiring from a former holder, but of a party beginning and making his prescriptive title, by going, as it was said, to a wrong superior, the Crown, and taking a charter from that superior. Yet the Court sustained the prescriptive title as a title to exclude.'

"It is said that the defender's possession is inconsistent with a prescriptive right, because during the period of prescription he has paid feu-duties to the pursuer. But the condition of his title requires him to pay to the lord of erection. The only point that can be raised upon the fact of payment is that the sums paid to the pursuer and his predecessors are in accordance with the earlier titles granted by them, and not in exact accordance with the reddendo of the crown charter. I do not consider how this discrepancy arises, because there has been no proof on the question of possession, and I am not satisfied that the scription, there could be no good prescriptive title without possession on it, and there was here no possession on the crown charter. The rights of a superior could not be lost non utendo, and therefore it was no answer to the pursuer to refer to the fact that he had for so long allowed the lands to be in non-entry. Now, the badge of possession was the payment of feu-duty, and the feu-duty which was paid was the feu-duty due under the Duke's charter, not that due under the Crown's. The Duke was infeft in the superiority, and drew his feu-duty all along. Could it be said that his right had been lost? Nor could the vassal be heard to say that he was possessing on the crown charter. [LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—Then upon what was he possessing? He had no title from the Duke, for the crown charter was a charter of resignation, i.e., the vassal disponed all that was in him to the Crown, who gave it back again as from itself.] He was possessing on a personal title flowing down from Cairncroce. If the Crown was not truly superior, the vassal at any moment of the currency of the prescriptive period, if asked under what title he was holding, must have answered, "under the old title," for till the prescriptive period ran out he had no other good title. [LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—But he may, may he not, elect to possess on the bad title; may he not make up a title to it?] But he may also elect to possess on the personal title, and the question of fact is, on which did he possess? On that matter the payment of the feu-duty was conclusive.

As regarded authority, the case of Cunynghame, referred to by the Lord Ordinary,[1] had no bearing on the present question. There was no point as to possession there. The point determined was that a crown charter, although it proceeded on a narrative which was false would form a good foundation for prescription. The other case referred to by the Lord Ordinary[2] had no bearing on the present case, save for the dictum quoted by the Lord Ordinary. But a judgment pronounced by Lord Gifford[3] was a direct authority for the pursuer here. The pursuer in that case reduced a crown charter in similar circumstances on the grounds facts as to the use of payment have been fully ascertained. But taking the facts as the pursuer represents them, I am of opinion that they constitute no interruption of possession. On the contrary, these payments can only be ascribed to the vassal's right under the crown title. For the pursuer's case is that the lands have been in non-entry, that is to say, that no vassal has held under him for more than forty years; and for a much longer period he and his predecessors have been receiving feu-duties from successive proprietors of the lands who were not their vassals, but were holding under the Crown. Now the lord of erection could have no right to exact feu-duties from anybody except from a proprietor infeft either of himself or of the Crown, and therefore the acceptance of feu-duties by the Dukes of Buccleuch from successive proprietors who did not hold of them, but who held of the Crown, appears to be very like a recognition of the crown title. At all events it precludes the pursuer from denying that the crown vassals were in possession of the lands or alleging that the exaction of payment by himself and his predecessors was an invasion of that possession. And the point is of no importance unless it can be held that the payment of feu-duties interrupted the possession, because the amount to which the pursuer is entitled as successor to the lord of erection is not in question in this action.

"The better answer, however, is that the possession on which the defender is entitled to found is his actual and continuous occupation of the lands under crown charters and infeftments for more than forty years, and this possession requires no further proof than the pursuer's averments on record. . . ."

that it had been obtained without his knowledge, and that the old feu-duty having been paid all along, there had been no possession under the crown writ.

The defender argued;—His title was a good prescriptive title founded on the crown charter of 1841. It was said against that that it could not be (1) as having been granted without the Duke's knowledge; and (2) as not having been clothed with possession. But (1) no such answer could be put forward against a plea of prescription, and a superior might be changed by the operation of prescription—Ferguson v. Gracie[1]—so that there was nothing unknown to the law in such a title. As regarded (2) possession, there had been actual possession of the lands. Of that there was no doubt. Payment of feu-duty was not possession by the vassal, it was merely evidence as to what title he was possessing upon. The payment to the Duke was accounted for by the fact that he was the King's donatory, and the payment of a wrong feu-duty was cleared up by the correspondence, which shewed also that the vassal believed that he was holding of the Crown, while the Duke believed at that time that he was drawing the annual payments, not as himself superior, but as the Crown's donatory. In the case decided by Lord Gifford there was not the speciality which here existed of the original superior having another alternative title on which the payments might have been made, so that they could only be referred to the old title of superiority. Here the vassal must have been possessing on the crown charter, for he had no other title. By the resignation which had taken place he had nothing else left in him, the personal title was gone. In cases of double title it had been held that, while a destination could not be evacuated by the mere form of a service, i.e., by serving, not as heir of the destination, but under the old investiture, yet, if a new investiture were taken from the Crown the personal title under the destination was gone, and could not be revived.[2]

LORD YOUNG.—I agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that the existing crown title, fortified as it is by prescription, is a conclusive answer to the present action.

The crown title which was made up in 1841 was ex facie a good title, subject to challenge by anyone who thought that his rights were prejudiced by it. It was a good foundation for prescription. That is to say, that after prescription had run all objections proceeding on the ground that the right ought not to have been granted, because the right of another was thereby infringed, are excluded by the lapse of time.

The title was made up on the footing that these lands were kirk lands, and that the vassal was therefore entitled to claim to hold immediately under the Crown, reserving to the superior under whom he formerly held, the lord of erection, the right to the feu-duties.

It was admitted for the pursuer that, but for the circumstance that a sum continued to be paid equal to the sum of feu-duty due to the Duke as superior, notwithstanding the terms of the crown charter, which stipulated for a lower feu-duty, he would have had no case. I quite agree that that is so, and that presents the case thus, viz., does the fact of £3, 10s. Scots having been paid in place of 10s. interpose as a bar so as to prevent prescription running on the crown title, which contains a different reddendo, 10s. Scots? I do not think it does, and I can find no principle in the law for it.

But the correspondence laid before us throws some light on how this came about. It seems that the sum in the crown charter must have been erroneously introduced. How it was introduced we cannot tell. It was a very insignificant blunder, and when the matter was brought under notice in 1866, on the occasion of seven years' arrears of this trifling reddendo being demanded, Mr Boyd's agent pointed out that the demand was in excess of what the crown charter bore. The Duke's agents reply that the reservation should have been five shillings and tenpence. Mr Boyd's agent concludes by saying that such a bagatelle is not worth corresponding about or discussing any further, and therefore he agrees to pay on the footing that the sum should have been five shillings and tenpence. Payment on that footing cannot have the effect the pursuer attributes to it.

Superior and Vassal—Prescription—Possession.—A person in possession of lands which were alleged to be kirk lands resigned them in 1806 to the Crown for new infeftment and took a charter on a blench tenure for a penny Scots si peteretur tantum. Up to this date the lands had been held in feu of a subject-superior (who held his superiority under a strict entail), for a reddendo of £6 Scots. After obtaining the crown charter the vassal held the lands for more than the prescriptive period, but paid the feu-duty of £6 Scots to the subject-superior, who remained infeft in the superiority; no payment was ever demanded by the Crown, except some payment on the charter being granted, the character of which was not ascertained. Some of the vassals from 1806 downwards were enrolled as freeholders, and voted as such.

The subject-superior having in 1871 brought against the vassal a reduction of the crown title, as having been unwarrantably obtained in prejudice of his rights as superior, the vassal pleaded prescription. Held (per Lord Gifford, Ordinary) that there had been no sufficient possession by the vassal on that title, and the plea of prescription repelled, and the title reduced.

OUTER-HOUSE Lord Gifford.

THE following narrative is taken from the Lord Ordinary's opinion:—"The object of the action is to reduce and set aside certain crown charters which the defender or her authors have obtained in the lands of Woodend or Wooden and others, the dominium utile of which belongs to the defender, and to have it declared that the pursuer, the Duke of Roxburghe, is vested with the superiority or dominium directum of the defender's lands. The question therefore really is, who is the superior of the defender's property—the Crown or the pursuer?

"The Lord Advocate, as representing the Crown, was called as a defender, but has stated no defence, and the record has been made up between the pursuer, the Duke of Roxburghe, claiming the superiority, and the defender, Miss Scott, the proprietrix of Wooden, who claims to hold directly of the Crown. The Lord Ordinary has assumed that the defender, Miss Scott, is entitled to maintain all the pleas which might have been stated by the Crown.

* Decided June 22, 1871, and referred to in the preceding case.

Oct. 21, 1890. Duke of Roxburghe v. Scott.

"Preliminary defences were lodged by the defender, who pleaded prescriptive possession upon an exclusive title, that is, under the crown charters sought to be reduced. As it became obvious, however, that the preliminary defence was in its essence the defence upon the merits, or at least one of the defences upon the merits, the preliminary defences were reserved, the production satisfied, and the record closed of new upon the whole cause.

"As the point of possession was exceedingly material, and as parties were at issue upon that and upon other matters of fact, a proof was allowed. A short proof was led, a great variety of titles and documents were recovered, and the Lord Ordinary heard a full debate on the whole cause. He is of opinion that the pursuer is entitled to decree in terms of the whole conclusions of the action.

"It is proved by the title-deeds produced that the defender's lands of Wooden were for many years prior to 1807 held of and under the Duke of Roxburghe and his predecessors, as superiors thereof. The earliest charter, which seems to be the constitution of the relation of superior and vassal, is the charter of 4th September 1634, by the Earl of Roxburghe to Andrew Kerr, but it is sufficient in the meantime to say that there is a series of charters by the pursuer's predecessors to the defender's authors, the last of which appears to be a charter of confirmation and precept of clare constat by the Duke of Roxburghe to Robert Walker of Wooden, Writer to the Signet, dated 6th August 1787, upon which the said Robert Walker, W.S., was infeft the same year. The feu-duty payable by Robert Walker is £6 Scots, or 10s. sterling, and it is admitted that this feu-duty has been regularly paid by the said Robert Walker, and by the subsequent proprietors of Wooden, including the present defender, to the pursuer and his authors, and that down to the present date.

"In 1806 the said Robert Walker, W.S., who then held the lands of Wooden feu under the Duke of Roxburghe, and who stood infeft upon the Duke's precept of 1787, executed a procuratory of resignation, in which he resigned the lands for new infeftment to be made in his own favour, and upon this procuratory he took out a charter, not from the Duke of Roxburghe, but from the Crown, dated 4th July 1807. The tenure in this crown charter is blench for a penny Scots if asked only, and upon this charter Robert Walker was infeft on 26th September 1807. This forms the foundation of the defender's alleged prescriptive possession under the Crown.

"There are two subsequent crown charters expede by the defender's authors in 1827 and 1837, and the whole three charters are now sought to be reduced by the pursuer."

The pursuers pleaded;—(6) The authors and predecessors of the defender, the said Janet Scott, having for more than forty years, and down to the year 1863, paid to the pursuer and his predecessors, as superiors of the said lands, the feu-duties stipulated in the charters of said lands granted by the pursuer's predecessors, and having otherwise recognised the pursuer and his predecessors as superiors of the said lands, the said Janet Scott is barred from pleading a prescriptive title on the crown charters libelled, or any one of them. (7) The pursuer, in virtue of his titles set forth in the condescendence, has the only and undoubted right and title to, and is fully vest and seized in, the superiority or dominium directum of the said lands of Woodend or Wooden and others, described in the summons, and is entitled to have decree of declarator, in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the summons. (8) The pursuer, in virtue of the titles set forth in the condescendence, and of uninterrupted possession thereon for more than forty years, or from time immemorial, has the only and undoubted right and title to the superiority or dominium directum of the said lands of Woodend or Wooden and others, described in the summons, and is entitled to decree, in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the summons.

The defender pleaded;—The defender, and her predecessors and authors, having possessed the plenum dominium of the lands of Wooden under the Crown upon the titles produced, without challenge or interruption for more than forty years, the defender has a sufficient title to exclude that of the pursuer, . . . and ought to be assoilzied.

After dealing with the question of prescription so raised, and with a plea to the effect that the plea of prescription was not well founded in respect that the Duke had been for part of that period a minor, the Lord Ordinary had also to consider on the merits the question whether the crown title should be reduced, or should be upheld on the footing that the lands were kirk lands, and that the vassal was therefore entitled to go past the lord of erection, and apply direct to the Crown for a title. On these questions, the Lord Ordinary was of opinion that the plea of minority was well founded, and on the merits, after repelling the plea of prescription both on this ground of minority and for the reasons stated below in his note, his Lordship held that the vassal was not justified in passing over the Duke and going direct to the Crown for a title, because the lands were not shewn to be kirk lands, and the Duke was not shewn to be a lord of erection, and that even if the defender could overcome these considerations, she had barred herself from recurring to the Crown by electing to hold under the Duke.[1] The Lord Ordinary accordingly reduced the crown writs, as craved.*

[1] To shew that a vassal might be so barred, his Lordship referred to these authorities, viz.:—Mackenzie's Obs. p. 403; Heriot's Hospital v. Hepburn, June 9, 1714, Mor. 7986, reversed on appeal, see House of Lords Report, Robertson's Appeal Cases, 124; Dundonald v. Fullerton, Jan. 24, 1730, Mor. 7997; Duke of Gordon v. Fyfe, March 4, 1773, Mor. 15,096; see also Erskine, ii. 10, 28.

* "NOTE.— . . . (On the question of prescription)—The Lord Ordinary will, as briefly as possible, consider the various questions thus raised.

"I. It may be convenient to take first the defender's plea of prescriptive possession upon the crown charter of 1807, sasine thereon, and subsequent crown titles.

"Now, it is quite true that if a vassal holding of one superior disclaims that superior and takes a charter from another superior, and thereupon refuses to pay any duties or casualties to the first, but pays the whole to the second, and if this goes on without interruption for forty years, the first superior will lose his right, and the second superior, supposing him to have a sufficient title, as in this case the Crown undoubtedly has, will acquire and hold the superiority by a prescriptive title.

"The Lord Ordinary thinks that the defender's plea of prescription is not applicable to the present case, and must be repelled for the following reasons:—

"(1) The defender's possession under the crown charters is not sufficient. She and her authors have never paid feu-duty to the Crown, the holding being blench; and although, on taking out the charters of 1827 and 1837, something was paid to the Crown, it does not appear whether it was merely the fees attending a crown charter, or whether there was composition or relief, and if so, what the composition or relief duty really was. This is very slender possession on the part of the Crown.

"The only other acts of possession relied on by the defender were that her authors, Robert Walker, W.S., Robert Haldane Scott, Esquire, and George Scott, were enrolled as freeholders, attended meetings as such, and voted at parliamentary elections. To some extent this is proved, but the Lord Ordinary thinks that these are not good acts of possession as against the pursuer. The Duke of Roxburghe and his authors were not freeholders; they did not and could not attend the courts or meetings of freeholders, and as Peers they could not take any part in the elections. They had no title to challenge the claim of an alleged freeholder to be put on the roll, and they were not bound to know, and possibly did not know, anything about the roll of freeholders. If they could not challenge the claim it cannot be held as prescriptive possession against them.

"In one view, indeed, the fact that Robert Walker, W.S., immediately after getting his crown charter of 1807, claimed to be put, and was put, on the roll of freeholders, suggests a solution of the whole mystery. The Lord Ordinary immediately asked, Was the then Duke of Roxburghe not manufacturing votes? Did he not convey the superiority to Robert Walker, W.S., to be held of the Crown, on which Robert Walker, W.S. (not an unlikely voter), took infeftment, and expede a crown title? If so, there would be an end of the whole case.

"But the answer was, There was no such conveyance. Nor could there be, for the Duke of Roxburghe held the superiority under strict entail, and could not make a vote without a forfeiture. The records and registers have been strictly searched, and the defender admitted that no trace whatever had been found of any conveyance, act, or deed of any kind by the then Duke of Roxburghe. This being so, the Lord Ordinary cannot hold, without any evidence, that the superiority was alienated, and that a fatal contravention of the entail had been committed.

"(2) The alleged possession of the defender's authors was not exclusive under the Crown. They still paid the full feu-duty to the Duke of Roxburghe, and this must be held, unless the contrary be shewn, as acknowledging him and possessing under him as superior.

"No doubt the defender says that the feu-duties were paid to the Duke of Roxburghe, not as superior, but as lord of erection, but then this is not proved, and cannot be assumed. This will be adverted to afterwards, but in the meantime it is sufficient, in the question of prescription, for the Duke to point to the charter of 1787 and prior charters, which expressly stipulate the feu-duty of 10s. per annum, as conclusively proving not only the title under which that feu-duty was levied, but as fixing its character as feu-duty of lands held feu under the Duke.

"A few of the receipts for the feu-duty have been recovered, and they all bear to be 'feu-duty of the lands of Wooden,' due to the Duke. In one of the receipts the lands of Wooden are parenthetically mentioned as 'part of the Abbacy Lands of Kelso,' but this is of no consequence in the question of prescription, the point being that the levying of a feu is an act of possession on the part of the superior. This suggests—

"(3) That there has really been during the prescriptive period complete possession on the part of the Duke of Roxburghe as superior. He has always stood infeft in the lands as superior. He has levied every farthing of the feu-duty, which, though small (10s. per annum), is not nominal. What more could he do? No doubt he might have insisted in non-entry at or after 1825, for his last vassal, Robert Walker, W.S., died in that year, but it cannot be held that a superior, infeft in the lands and regularly levying his feu-duty, can lose his right merely because he does not insist upon his vassal's heir taking out a charter. . . .

"(5) And lastly, the Duke and his authors were not bound to search the Registers of Sasines to see that no infeftment was put on record adverse to their superiority title. This is not the purpose of the records. A superior who has a vassal infeft under him, and who is regularly getting his feu-duty, is entitled to assume that no adverse or different infeftment will be put upon record. It is the vassal's duty to institute a challenge if he is to dispute the right of superiority.

"In every view therefore the Lord Ordinary thinks that the plea of the prescription must be repelled."

No. 4. HENRY MONCREIFF HORSBRUGH (D. Souter Robertson's Trustee), Pursuer (Reclaimer).—C. S. Dickson—W. Campbell.

Oct. 24, 1890. Robertson's Trustee v. Royal Bank of Scotland. ROYAL BANK OF SCOTLAND, Defenders (Respondents).—Low—Fleming.

Retention—Bank—Contract of deposit.—A bank has a right to retain all negotiable instruments belonging to a customer and in its possession, for the purpose of securing a debtor balance on general account, but this right may be excluded by agreement, express or implied.

Certain bonds were deposited from time to time with a bank by a customer—the receipts by the former bearing that they were held "for safe keeping on your account and subject to your order." It appeared that advances were made by the bank to the customer concurrently with the making of the deposits, and that the bank's agent had asked that the deposits should be made in order to meet these. In an action by the trustee on the customer's sequestrated estate for delivery of the bonds, held that the terms of the receipts did not instruct any special agreement of parties such as would exclude the right of retention which the custody of the bonds gave to the bank, especially when supported as it was by the actings of parties.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Kinnear. M.

MR DAVID SOUTER ROBERTSON died on 10th November 1888. His estates were sequestrated, and Mr H. M. Horsbrugh was appointed trustee on 18th March 1889.

Mr Souter Robertson had kept a bank account with the branch of the Royal Bank of Scotland at Brechin, of which branch Mr James Guthrie was agent. At his death there were in the hands of the branch bank four City of Edinburgh Annuity Bonds, which were payable to bearer and transmissible by simple delivery,—the first for £3500 capital, and the other three for £500 each,—all with coupons attached, which had been deposited by Mr Souter Robertson with the bank—the first on 25th November 1887, the second and third on 12th April 1888, and the fourth on 27th April 1888. The bank had granted receipts for the bonds in their agent's name in the following terms, which, mutatis mutandis, were the same in each case:—"Royal Bank of Scotland, Brechin, 25th Nov. 1887.—D. Souter Robertson, Murlingden.—Dear Sir,—We hold for safe keeping on your account, and subject to your order, City of Edinburgh Annuity Bond, No. 3937, for the payment annually of £105, with coupons attached, £52, 10s. each, payable half-yearly on 1st February and 1st August.—Yours, &c. DAVID GUTHRIE & SONS, Agents." These bonds were only a portion of those originally deposited.

The coupons, &c. were collected by the bank when due, and the proceeds placed to Mr Souter Robertson's account.

In July 1889 the trustee brought an action against the Royal Bank for delivery of the bonds.

The defenders in answer claimed a right to retain the securities until payment of the debt due to them by the late Mr Souter Robertson. They further stated,—"Explained further, that it was all along understood and agreed upon, both by him and by the defenders, that the bonds lodged with them were to be held by the defenders against any advances by them to Mr Souter Robertson, and that on the faith of this understanding and agreement the defenders allowed advances to the extent of the value of the said bonds, increasing the advance as additional bonds were lodged with them, but in no case without remonstrance allowing the amount to be exceeded. On the only occasion when the advance exceeded the value of the bonds lodged, the defenders wrote asking for additional bonds to be lodged."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The bonds and coupons referred to being part of the sequestrated estates of Mr David Souter Robertson, the pursuer is entitled to delivery thereof. (2) In respect of the acknowledgments quoted, the pursuer is entitled to decree, as concluded for. (3) The defenders' statements are irrelevant; et separatim, they can only be proved scripto.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The defenders, being entitled to retain the bonds sued for until payment of the debt due to them, should be assoilzied, with expenses.

On 5th November 1889 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) allowed, before answer, the defenders a proof habili modo of their averments and the pursuer a conjunct probation, and on 7th December following the First Division refused a reclaiming note at the instance of the pursuer against that interlocutor.

A proof, both oral and documentary, was led.

From the letters which had passed between Mr Guthrie, the bank-agent, and Mr Souter Robertson and his sons, Mr George and Mr Thomas Robertson-Chaplin, and from Mr Guthrie's own testimony, it appeared that the latter had intimated his view that the bank held the bonds in security of overdrafts, and that Mr Souter Robertson had not dissented from that view. The details of the evidence and of the state of Mr Souter Robertson's account with the bank are fully given in the opinions of the Judges, particularly in those of the Lord Ordinary and Lord Adam.

On 25th February 1890, the Lord Ordinary assoilzied the defenders.*

* "OPINION.—Having considered the proof in this case, I have come to the conclusion that the bank have established the lien which they claim.

"Had it appeared that the receipts which are quoted on record constituted or fully expressed the contract between the parties, and had those receipts required to be construed without any help from outside, I should probably have felt compelled to come to a different conclusion. For I before observed that a deposit for safe keeping appeared to me to be prima facie a deposit for a special purpose, and a special purpose inconsistent with the general lien which the defenders claim. And I have seen no reason to change that opinion. It is true, as the defenders urge, that the deposit here was of negotiable securities, and it may be that, as between a banker and his customer, a deposit of negotiable securities has different incidents from, e.g., a deposit of plate. But if the deposit is expressed to be for safe keeping, and there is nothing to qualify that expression, I have not been able to see that a deposit of bonds is in a different position from, e.g., a deposit of plate. And therefore, although there have been dicta of some authority to the effect that a banker's lien extends over all paper securities placed for any purpose in the banker's hands, I am not, I confess, prepared, in the absence of direct decision, to carry the banker's lien so far. Indeed, as regards decision, the leading case on the subject, Brundao v. Barnett, decided in the House of Lords (12 Clark and Finelly, p. 787), appears to me to confine the lien within considerably narrower limits. For in that case the lien was held excluded where Exchequer bills (usually deposited in the banker's safe in a box, of which the customer kept the key) were handed to the banker to obtain payment of the interest due and to have the bills renewed, and where the customer failed, while the new bills still remained in the banker's hands waiting for redeposit in the customer's box.

"But the question always is, what were the terms of the contract under which the deposit was made; and here I am not able to accept the pursuer's argument that it is illegitimate to look beyond the terms of the receipts which the bank granted to the deceased. For that argument implies that those receipts must be taken as expressing the final and whole contract between the parties, and as expressing it, moreover, in terms which do not admit of construction even by the subsequent writings or subsequent actings. Now, I do not think that the receipt granted upon the deposit is a document which at all necessarily expresses the terms of the deposit. It may do so, but on the other hand it may not. The contract of deposit may lie behind the receipt altogether. It may have been concluded by a formal deed, or by missives, or by correspondence,

No. 4.

Robertson's Trustee v. Royal Bank of Scotland.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The terms of the receipts were such as to exclude the right of retention which the bank would otherwise or even by verbal agreement, and the receipt may in such cases be merely executive of the contract, and of little or no importance even for purposes of construction. Or the receipt may be one of several sources from which the terms of the contract fall to be gathered. For example, it may fall to be read simply as a letter in a correspondence, or as a letter or telegram passing in the course of communications partly written and partly verbal. It is certainly not a document which is at all in the position of a formal deed. And the contract of deposit being always a consensual contract, capable of being constituted verbally and proved by parole, I confess I see no reason why, in a case like the present, the whole communications between the parties should not be considered, and the true terms of the contract ascertained.

"In this view I think it is quite legitimate to look at the evidence which has been adduced by the bank, which evidence consists partly of the testimony of Mr Guthrie, the bank's agent in Brechin, partly of certain correspondence passing between that gentleman and the late Mr Robertson, and partly of Mr Robertson's bank account, a copy of which, taken from the bank's books, is produced.

"Mr Guthrie's evidence, if accepted, appears conclusive. I do not suppose that can be disputed. His statement is that Mr Robertson's account being, in November 1887, overdrawn, he (Mr Guthrie) suggested a deposit of bonds, or rather a deposit of additional bonds, by way of cover, and that Mr Robertson at once agreed to this; and the deposit first mentioned on record was arranged and made expressly for the purpose of covering the then overdraft. He says further, that the deposit having been thus arranged and made, the receipt granted was expressed as for safe keeping, in the same terms as previous receipts, because both he and Mr Robertson considered, rightly or wrongly, that those terms were quite consistent with the bank's lien, which lien it was the expressed object of both of them to bring into force. He says, further, that Mr Robertson was allowed further credit in respect of the increased cover thus obtained; and that the two subsequent deposits mentioned on record—both made in April 1888, were arranged in the same way, and were followed by similar extended credits. In short, if Mr Guthrie's evidence is to be accepted, there was in the case of each deposit an express agreement that the bank should have a lien over the bonds deposited for their general balance.

"The question, however, is, whether Mr Guthrie's evidence is sufficiently corroborated. For, entirely as I believe his statement, he is certainly in the position of a party, and perhaps a deeply interested party; and I should have at least hesitated to accept his unsupported testimony as against the prima facie import of the three receipts. But I am glad to be relieved from considering that question, because I am of opinion that Mr Guthrie is amply corroborated not only by the bank account, which, so far as it goes, supports his statement, but also by the correspondence which passed between him and Mr Robertson and Mr Robertson's son—Mr George Robertson-Chaplin. I incline to think that the terms of the contract in which the first deposit (that of November 1887) was made are sufficiently ascertained, apart from the parole evidence altogether, by Mr Guthrie's letter to Mr Robertson-Chaplin of 4th November 1887, and Mr Robertson's postscript to his letter of 19th November 1887; and I think that the bank's view of the several transactions is also borne out and illustrated by, inter alia, Mr Guthrie's letter of 1st June 1888, Mr Robertson's letter (no date), No. 47, and Mr Guthrie's letters to Mr Robertson-Chaplin of 12th June 1888 and 31st July 1888. These letters I think shew pretty conclusively that throughout the communications Mr Guthrie, Mr Robertson, and his son Mr George Robertson-Chaplin (who lived with him and acted for him), recognised that the bonds held by the bank were subject to the bank's general lien; and that, when additional credit was required, further bonds required to be lodged.

"I therefore hold that Mr Guthrie's account of the matter is sufficiently corroborated; and, in these circumstances, it is not necessary to consider how far, if the contract had been constituted by the receipts and the receipts alone, have had. It might be that the words "for safe keeping on your account" were not sufficient to exclude the right, but the addition of the words "subject to your order" made it clear what the purpose of the deposit was, and that the depositor was to retain his control over the bonds. These words were equivalent to "returnable on demand." It was not as bankers that the defenders received the bonds; they were given to them for custody only, and to be put into their safe, and not like bills for collection or to be discounted.[1] The case was one of proper deposit, which, being of a confidential character, would not ground retention.[2] Where, as here, the receipt fully expressed the contract it was not legitimate to appeal to parole evidence outside it. It was only where the receipt was silent as to the terms of the contract that parole was available to clear it up. It was true that the bank collected the interest coupons, and that that part of the contract was not expressed in the receipt. But such an arrangement was not inconsistent with the contract as expressed in the receipt. The other evidence which it was proposed to introduce was inconsistent with the terms of the contract, and was inadmissible. The case could not be illustrated by the law of retention in bankruptcy. There the debt must arise out of the contract in the execution of which the deposit of the documents which it was sought to retain took place.[3] Further, there were no cases where that doctrine had been carried so far as in the cases of Meikle and Robertson, and it was doubtful how far they were sound law. The doctrine of balancing accounts in bankruptcy did not go the length of including incorporeal moveables, unless in cases where there was a general lien.[4]

Argued for the respondents:—It was well-established that bankers had a right of retention for an unsecured balance over unappropriated paper securities in their hands.[5] There was an onus on the pursuer here to shew a special contract taking it out of the general rule. The securities in the case of Brundao were Exchequer bills, which were kept by the bank in a box of which their customer had the key, so that the bank was not so much the custodier of the securities as of the box. But it was not disputed that the bills were held by the bank in their capacity as bankers. The terms of the receipts in the present case did not conflict with the general right of lien which the bank had, and merely expressed what would have been implied if nothing had been said. The bonds were the subsequent correspondence and subsequent actings of parties would have sufficed to construe the receipts in a manner favourable to the bank. It is not, however, to be overlooked that the actings of parties make it at least plain that the deposits in question were in no view deposits for safe keeping merely. That is to say, it is clear upon the proof that, although not expressed in the receipts, it was a part of the arrangement between the parties that the bank should undertake to collect the coupon interest as it fell due and to put it to the credit of Mr Robertson's account. That at least goes to shew that the receipts did not express the full contract between the parties.

"On the whole, therefore, I conclude, as I said at the outset, that the bank have established their lien, and that they are entitled to absolvitor, with expenses."

transmissible by delivery under the statute,* and by possession a formal title of property in them was acquired. An agreement for "safe keeping" was quite consistent with the bank's right of lien.[1] The written receipts did not embody the whole contract, and it was competent to look at the communications and actings of the parties in order to ascertain the true nature of the contract. Further, the collection of the half-yearly coupons was a matter outside the written contract, and shewed that the case was not one of proper deposit. Otherwise the bank would not have had power to cut off the coupons and draw the proceeds. Parole being admissible, the evidence of Mr Thomas Robertson-Chaplin (who was examined after the case came into the Inner-House) and of Mr Guthrie, the bank manager, was conclusive as to the intention of parties. Further, the correspondence between the value of the bonds deposited from time to time, and the amount of the overdrafts at the different periods pointed to an understanding that the former were cover for the latter. The delivery of these bonds was not the constitution of a contract of pledge or deposit, but of property,[2] nor, in any event, could the mandate or trust of deposit subsist after the bankruptcy of the mandant.[3]

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an action at the instance of the trustee upon the sequestrated estate of the late David Souter Robertson, which is brought for the purpose of compelling delivery of four City of Edinburgh bonds, which are specifically identified in the conclusion of the summons. The defence is embodied in the second plea in law for the defender, which is—"The defenders, being entitled to retain the bonds sued for until payment of the debt due to them, should be assoilzied, with expenses." The Lord Ordinary has in effect sustained this plea and assoilzied the defenders. This is a plea of retention, and it appears to me that the ordinary rule and doctrine of retention is directly applicable to the settling of accounts between a banker and his customer whether in bankruptcy or in the case where the customer is still solvent. It is generally spoken of, particularly by Mr Bell in his Commentaries, as bankers' lien, but it seems to me to be simply the right of retention which is known to the common law and applicable to cases of this description.

The question is whether it is applicable to the circumstances of the present case. The rule may be fairly defined as a general right to retain all unappropriated negotiable instruments belonging to the customer in the hands of the banker for securing his balance on general account. It cannot be doubted in the present case that there is a large balance due to the banker by the customer, and further, that the four bonds in question are in the possession of the banker. But it has been maintained by the pursuer that the bonds were lodged for a specific purpose and not in the usual course of business so as to constitute a security for a general balance. Of course the doctrine of retention to which I have referred is subject to this exception, that if a negotiable instrument is lodged with a banker for the purpose of securing payment of a particular debt, or for any specific purpose, then in that case the general rule does not apply, but on the other hand that specific purpose must be clearly ascertained, otherwise the general rule will prevail.

Oct. 24, 1890. Robertson's Trustee v. Royal Bank of Scotland.

The only evidence on which the pursuer relies as indicating the specific appropriation of the bonds in the present case is to be found in the terms of the receipts granted by the agent of the bank at Brechin, when the bonds were handed to him on 25th November 1887, 12th April 1888, and 27th April 1888, and the receipts are all substantially in the same terms. The first of these receipts is in the following terms—"We hold for safe keeping on your account, and subject to your order, City of Edinburgh annuity bond . . . for the payment annually of £105 with coupons attached, £52, 10s. each, payable half-yearly on 1st February and 1st August. The words which are particularly relied upon by the pursuer are "for safe keeping on your account, and subject to your order." The terms of the document are not "for safe keeping only" or "exclusively," but "for safe keeping on your account and subject to your order." I think it may be very fairly assumed that, when a customer of a bank deposits a negotiable instrument with his bankers, one object which he has in view is the safe custody of the document, because a bank has means of keeping such paper securities more safely than the customer can. The bank has safes on their premises, which private individuals have not, and by depositing with the bank the customer gains the advantage of much safer keeping. We may, therefore, reasonably infer that the object for which the bonds were handed to the bank partly was to place them in safer custody than he could himself command. This purpose has a still more special significance because of the nature of the documents deposited. The bonds are transmissible by mere delivery from hand to hand and the interest coupons are payable to the person who presents them for payment when they fall due. They are documents which it is particularly easy to negotiate and they afford the most handy and available security to a banker. So long as the customer's account remains in a wholesome condition, I think the receipt very fairly expresses the relation of the parties, because if there is no overdraft then the object in handing the bonds to the bank was only that of "safe keeping on your account and subject to your order," and it was in the power of the customer at any time to demand redelivery. But if it were intended by Mr Robertson, the depositor, that the bonds in question should be specifically appropriated, we should have expected that this would have been more distinctly set out in the receipt. The presumption is that custody gives a right of retention, and I think that that presumption cannot be rebutted without something express and distinct.

The evidence otherwise is entirely in favour of the defenders. The Lord Ordinary has dealt with the case as if it lay upon the defenders to remove the presumption which is created by the terms of the receipt. I confess I can hardly go along with his Lordship in this view, because I do not think that the terms of the receipts remove the original presumption caused by the custody of the bonds. With that reservation, I agree entirely with his Lordship as to the import of the evidence. One point to which I attach the highest importance, and which indeed by itself appears to me to be quite conclusive, arises upon the face of the bank account and the vouchers, which have been produced. On each occasion on which a bond was handed to the bank, the customer was desirous of making an overdraft or an additional overdraft upon his account,—and the overdraft which he proposed to make was quite understood by the parties to amount to a certain definite sum. If we look to the state of the bank account and of the vouchers, we find that at the same time as the overdraft was obtained there was deposited with the bank a City of Edinburgh bond of such an amount as precisely to cover the amount of the overdraft. On each occasion on which an advance was made, the exact sum to be advanced was ascertained, and an additional security was given, and the amount of the overdraft corresponded with the amount of the bond even to shillings and pence. It is impossible to say that these actings of parties are not completely subversive of the construction which the pursuer seeks to place upon the terms of the receipts taken by themselves. Where the object appears to have been that, if an overdraft was given, upon the same day a bond should be handed over to the bank to an amount precisely corresponding to the amount of the overdraft, and where the two sums thus exactly square, the inference is irresistible that the purpose of the deposit was to cover the overdraft.

The evidence of Mr Guthrie, the bank-agent, is also very important, but, no doubt, the observation is very justly made by the Lord Ordinary, that he was probably much interested in the result of the case. At the same time when we take Mr Guthrie's very clear testimony as to what passed between him and the late Mr Souter Robertson and his son,—and when we take in conjunction with that testimony the bank account and the vouchers to which I have referred,—I think there is such a corroboration of Mr Guthrie's evidence as puts it beyond all suspicion. The correspondence between the parties throws a good deal of light upon the question, and so does the evidence of Mr Souter Robertson's son who was examined after the case came into the Inner-House. It is sufficient for me to say that I agree with the Lord Ordinary in the result at which he has arrived, and I think that the defenders must be assoilzied.

Lord Adam.—This is an action brought by the trustee on Mr Souter Robertson's sequestrated estate, who asks that there shall be handed over to him four City of Edinburgh annuity bonds, of the cumulo amount of £5000. The bonds are all payable to bearer, and they are transmissible by simple delivery. That being the character of the bonds, I think they are clearly documents of such a nature as that the bankers' lien must apply to them. On Mr Souter Robertson's death, on 10th November 1888, the four bonds were found in possession of the bank. That being so, it appears to me that there is an onus on the pursuer to shew that the ordinary rule that a bank has a lien over securities of that kind in their possession for a general balance due to them by the depositor does not apply, and accordingly he has maintained that the bonds in question were deposited with the bank for a special purpose only, and that they do not therefore fall within the general rule to which I have referred.

The question is whether the pursuer has proved the specific appropriation. The evidence on which he relies to prove this, and, I think, the only evidence, is the terms of the receipts which were granted by the agent of the bank when the documents in question were handed to him. The receipts are all in the same terms, and the contention is that they bear that the deposits were made for safe keeping, and for safe keeping only. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the case would have been a difficult one if the receipts had been the only evidence to which we were entitled to look in deciding the legal character of the deposit. I quite concur in the view expressed in that part of his Lordship's note where he says, —"I do not think that the receipt granted upon a deposit is a document which at all necessarily expresses the terms of the deposit. It may do so; but, on the other hand, it may not. The contract of deposit may lie behind the receipt altogether. It may have been concluded by a formal deed, or by missives, or by correspondence, or even by verbal agreement, and the receipt may in such cases be merely executive of the contract, and of little or no importance even for purposes of construction. Or the receipt may be one of several sources from which the terms of the contract fall to be gathered. For example, it may fall to be read simply as a letter in a correspondence, or as a letter or telegram passing in the course of communications partly written and partly verbal." I think that is a correct exposition of the law. The true question, however, appears to me to be not the terms of the original deposit, but the terms upon which the bonds were being held at the date of Mr Souter Robertson's death. If that be so, it is obvious that the terms upon which the original deposit was made are only one of the elements of proof to be taken into consideration along with others. They are all admissible for the purpose of shewing on what footing the bonds were held at the date of Mr Souter Robertson's death. It is obvious that all the correspondence and actings subsequent to the deposits being made must be relevant to establish the defenders' contention.

I do not propose to go over the proof in detail, because it is clear that upon the evidence of Mr George Robertson Chaplin and others the bonds were being held by the bank in security of the overdrafts. I may refer, however, as an example to a letter dated 1st June 1888 from Mr Guthrie, the bank-agent, to Mr Chaplin, which is proved to have been shewn by him to his father. In that letter, Mr Guthrie says,—" . . . I think your father has some spare Edinburgh City Debt bonds at the Commercial Bank, has he not? Perhaps he could send us a bond for £500 or £1000 without any trouble. It would enable us to say that we held additional security to warrant these recent additional advances. I shall be glad to hear from you." And it seems to me to be capable of only one construction. He asks for "additional" security. Additional to what? To the only security held by the bank for their overdraft, namely, the four bonds. But further the actings of the parties shew clearly what was the character of the deposit.

Thus, I see that prior to 25th November 1887 the state of the bank account was that there was due to the bank a sum of £3210, and they then held bonds to the amount of £3000 only. The bank then applied to Mr Souter Robertson to get additional security, and upon 25th November he lodged a bond for £3500, getting back the bond for £3000. He lodged two bonds for £500 each on 12th April 1888, and upon the same date he passed a cheque for £750. On 27th April following other bonds were lodged to the amount of £800, and next day a cheque was passed for an additional £500. The passing of the cheques immediately followed the delivery of the bonds, and no one can doubt that the bonds were lodged as security for the drafts.

Apart altogether from Mr Guthrie's evidence, I should have been disposed to decide this case in favour of the defenders; but if we are to believe that evidence, I can have no doubt whatever. I quite agree with the Lord Ordinary that Mr Guthrie occupied an interested position, and if his evidence had stood alone there might have been a difficulty in acting upon it. But I think that the written evidence, and the actings of parties, are entirely corroboratory of that evidence, and upon the whole matter I think the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor ought to be adhered to.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur in the judgment proposed, and will merely indicate my view of the principle on which cases of this nature ought to be decided. It is a general principle in our law that every agent has a lien or right of retention against his principal for the balance due to him, and this right of retention is not confined to moneys collected, such as rents and dividends, but may extend to securities, the precise extent of the lien being determined by the nature or character of the agency. The so-called banker lien is an example of this rule of law, and in this case the decisions establish that a banker has a lien over all such negotiable securities of the customer as are lawfully in his possession and are subject to his control, but this lien may be excluded by agreement, express or implied. If the bill or security is specially appropriated, this is equivalent to an exclusion of the lien, because in the case supposed the banker has received the instrument under instructions which are inconsistent with the supposition that he is to have a lien.

In the present case I hardly think that the question raised is one of special appropriation, but the argument submitted by the trustee for Robertson's creditors is to the effect that the lien which the Royal Bank would, under other circumstances, have acquired was excluded by agreement.

In considering the meaning of the expressions used in the receipts which were granted by the Royal Bank for these bonds, it is necessary to attend to the distinction between a right in security and a lien. A proper security can only be constituted by the acts of the parties, the debtor and the creditor in the series of transactions, and if a question of construction arises, the creditor must establish affirmatively that a right of security was given to him. But a lien is something which the law gives to the creditor, or holds to arise to him from the mere fact of his possession of his debtor's property in the character of an agent; and where the relation of principal and agent or banker and customer exists, it is not necessary that the lien should be set up by proof,—the party claiming adversely to the lien must shew that by agreement the lien is excluded.

It appears to me that the expressions used in the receipts for these negotiable bonds are insufficient in themselves to exclude the banker's lien. The bonds are said to have been received "for safe keeping," and to be held "to the order" of Mr Robertson. If the Royal Bank had given notice of their intention to sell the bonds with the view of applying the proceeds in reduction of the overdraft, I do not doubt that this would have been a breach of contract, and that the sale might have been interdicted, because the terms of the receipt made it clear that the bank did not receive these instruments under a security title. But the bank is only claiming a right to detain the bonds until its claims are satisfied, and this lesser right, which results from the lien, extends to all negotiable instruments which the bank may have received in the ordinary course of business, and not under a special trust exclusive of lien.

Even if the case were more doubtful on the terms of the receipts, the evidence appears to me to place the right of the Royal Bank beyond dispute. Their agent, Mr Guthrie, in his letters to Mr Robertson's son, asserted his lien, and asked for further deposits of a like nature to cover advances. These letters were communicated to Mr Robertson, who did not dissent from Mr Guthrie's interpretation of the rights of the bank. It is therefore established that Mr Robertson had no intention of excluding the lien, and there being no intention to exclude the lien, it cannot be said that the lien was excluded by agreement. There is also the circumstance that the advances were made concurrently with the deposit of the bonds, and apparently in reliance on the right of lien which would in ordinary course result from such deposit. I am accordingly of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's judgment is well founded, and that the reclaiming note should be refused.

THE COURT adhered.

ALLAN FORSYTH, Pursuer (Respondent).—A. J. Young—A. S. D. Thomson.
RAMAGE & FERGUSON, Defenders (Appellants).—Salvesen.

Reparation—Master and Servant—Employers Liability Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. cap. 42)—Insufficient provision for servant's safety—Known danger.—In an action of damages raised by an engineer against his employers, a firm of shipbuilders and engineers, the pursuer averred that he had been employed in fitting up the boilers in a steamer which had been constructed by his employers, and was in course of completion; that he was in the habit of going to his work by the forward hatch, but as this passage was blocked he had, on one occasion, to proceed by the after hatch and through the engine-room; that in doing so he fell into a manhole in the floor of the engine-room and was injured; that the manhole was unprotected, except for some lead pipes which were lying on one side of it; that he was unaware of its existence, as it had been covered over on the only two occasions on which he had previously been in the engine-room; that at the time of the accident the light in the engine-room was dim; that there was a duty on the defenders to cover or protect the manhole so as to prevent accidents, but that they had failed to do so, although similar occurrences had taken place before; that it was the duty of the defenders to have had the engine-room properly lighted; and that their failure in these respects had led to the accident.

Held that, having regard to the circumstances stated, there was no relevant averment of fault on the part of the defenders, and action dismissed.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of the Lothians. M.

ALLAN FORSYTH, an engine-fitter in the employment of Messrs Ramage & Ferguson, shipbuilders and engineers in Leith, raised an action against his employers in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh, concluding for damages at common law, or under the Employers Liability Act.

The pursuer averred;—In May 1890, he had been in the service of the defenders for about a year, and was then employed as an engineer on board the steamship "Talune," which was in course of being completed. (Cond. 3) "On or about Monday the 19th day of May 1890, at ten o'clock in the forenoon, the pursuer had gone down the after hatch of the said vessel, for the purpose of commencing his usual work of fixing on the mountings of the boilers, at which he had been engaged for some weeks previously. In order to reach the boilers the pursuer's way, on this occasion, lay through the engine-room of the vessel, in which there is a manhole leading to a water tank underneath the engine-room, and which is used for ballast purposes. At the time above mentioned there were some lead pipes on the one side of the said manhole, but it was otherwise quite unprotected, and on making his way to the boilers on the morning in question, the pursuer on stepping across the foresaid lead pipes went into the manhole, and fell violently upon the other side of it, breaking three of the ribs of his left side, and otherwise sustaining serious bruises and injuries. . . ." (Cond. 4) "The pursuer was unaware of the existence of the manhole in question. It is explained that for some time previous to the said 19th day of May the pursuer had gone to his work upon the boilers by the forward hatch, which led to them direct. On the said 19th day of May, or the day previous, the forward hatch was blocked up, and he was compelled to proceed to his work by the after hatch, and through the engine-room, which was the only other road. Previous to the accident the pursuer had been only twice in the engine-room, and upon these occasions the said manhole was hidden by timber, or other material having been thrown over it, as he did not notice it." (Cond. 5) "It is believed and averred that the defenders, or at all events their foreman, James Aitken, under whose superintendence and directions the pursuer was working at the time of his accident, and for whom the defenders are responsible, as being a superintendent within the meaning of said Act, and whose whole duty was that of superintendence, and who was not ordinarily engaged in manual labour, knew that the said manhole was not covered or protected and was dangerous. It was the duty of the defenders, or of their foreman, the said James Aitken, to cover or protect the said manhole in order to prevent accidents to their workmen; but although they had received repeated warnings of the danger by other workmen stepping into the said hole previous to the pursuer's accident, they failed to cover or protect the said manhole, although this might have been done without in the least hindering the work and at insignificant expense. In so failing, the defenders or their said foreman were guilty of gross carelessness and neglect, and it is averred that this was the cause of the accident to the pursuer." (Cond. 6) "At the time of the said accident the light in the engine-room was dim, and there was no lamp burning to shew the pursuer the open manhole. The defenders in failing to have the said engine-room properly lighted were in fault, and their failure in this respect contributed to the pursuer's accident."

No. 5.

Oct. 25, 1890. Forsyth v. Ramage & Ferguson.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer having sustained loss, injury, and damage through the fault or negligence of the defenders, or of those for whom they are responsible, the pursuer is entitled to compensation from the defenders. (2) The pursuer having, while employed as a workman in the service of the defenders, been injured by reason of the fault or negligence of the defenders or those for whom they are responsible under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, he is entitled to decree for the sum second above sued for.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The pursuer's statements are irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons.

The Sheriff-substitute (Rutherfurd), on 11th July 1890, repelled the defenders' first plea in law, and allowed a proof.

The defenders appealed for jury trial to the Court of Session under the 40th section of the Judicature Act, and argued that there was no relevant averment of any duty which the defenders had neglected.[1] The case was one of carelessness on the part of the pursuer. The pursuer was quite in a position to see the manhole, because he saw the lead pipes.

The pursuer argued that the case ought not to be disposed of without inquiry.

Lord President.—This is the case of an accident which occurred to a workman who was engaged in completing the construction of a vessel. There is no doubt that when a vessel is in course of construction there are a great many risks incident to the employment in which the workmen are engaged. The vessel in question was not only not finished as regards her decks, but there were necessarily several holes in the flooring which were left for the convenience and use of the workmen employed. The pursuer was employed in fixing on the mountings of the boilers, and the way by which he made his way to that part of the vessel where he was engaged up to the 19th May 1890 was by going down the fore hatch, which enabled him to get easily to the boiler-room. But this route became blocked from some unexplained cause, and the pursuer was forced to use the after hatch. His averment is that,—"In order to reach the boilers the pursuer's way, on this occasion, lay through the engine-room of the vessel, in which there is a manhole leading to a water tank underneath the engine-room, and which is used for ballast purposes. At the time above mentioned there were some lead pipes on the one side of the said manhole, but it was otherwise quite unprotected, and on making his way to the boilers on the morning in question, the pursuer on stepping across the foresaid lead pipes went into the manhole, and fell violently upon the other side of it."

When the pursuer says that the manhole was unprotected, I do not understand him to mean that it is part of the duty of the owners or of their superintendent of works to have the manhole fenced. That is impossible, because it would be quite inconsistent with the progress of the work of completing the ship that such fencing should be required. Accordingly, the only allegation in the article I have read which has a bearing upon the question is, that there were some lead pipes lying between the pursuer and the manhole, and that he stumbled across these and fell in. That appears upon the face of it, if the fact is correctly set forth upon record, to have been a very careless proceeding. It is further stated that at the time of the accident the light in the engine-room was dim, but if this was so there was all the more need of caution on the part of the pursuer in threading his way to the place where his work was going on. Whether he knew of the existence of the manhole in question beforehand or not, it was undoubtedly his duty to look very carefully before him as he went along, because there were in that part of the vessel through which his way lay a number of manholes of a similar kind. He could not help knowing this, and that if the light was dim they would be very apt to be a trap for anyone who might be walking at all carelessly.

The only other averment which it is necessary to notice is in the 5th article of the condescendence,—"It was the duty of the defenders, or of their foreman, the said James Aitken, to cover or protect the said manhole in order to prevent accidents to their workmen." The pursuer does not explain what he intends when he says that there was a duty to "protect the manhole." It had no doubt to be left open for the constant use of the workmen who were completing the vessel. This allegation of duty is on the face of it very clearly irrelevant, because in order to make it intelligible it would be necessary to shew how the manhole could have been covered consistently with carrying on the completion of the ship. The pursuer upon his own statement acted very carelessly, and there is nothing set forth on this record which can be said to imply any failure of duty on the part of the defenders.

Lord Adam.—It appears to me that workmen engaged on a vessel which is in course of construction are bound to exercise caution in making their way about the ship, and in this particular case we know that there were a number of manholes in the floors of the engine and boiler-rooms. In regard to the accident, the fault alleged is that there was a failure of duty on the part of the defenders to have the manhole protected. In the case of a ship under construction, I think this would be out of the question. The manholes were left open from necessity, and I think there was no failure of duty. It is not said how the protection could have been carried out, nor is it said that the pursuer had any reason to anticipate that there would be no manhole at the place in question. I think there was a duty on the pursuer to see where he was going. The only other thing which is said is that the light was dim; if this was so there was the greater necessity for care on his part. I see no relevant averment of fault on the part of the defenders. I think the pursuer's carelessness was the cause of the accident.

Lord M'Laren.—I also agree with your Lordships in thinking that there is no relevant averment of a duty neglected on the part of the defenders. The ship was in course of construction, and it is ridiculous to make it a matter of complaint that the vessel had not at that time all the appliances which it would have in its completed state. I am far from saying that the want of any provision for lighting an uncompleted ship may not amount to negligence in the legal sense. In no case, of course, could it be lighted as thoroughly as it would be if on a voyage, but there ought at least to be a light or candle to guide the workman to the part of the vessel at which he is working. If it had been alleged that there was a total absence of lighting, I should have been inclined to let the case go to a jury; but all that is said is that the light was dim, which is quite inconsistent with the view that there was enough of light to enable the pursuer to see his way. I think the action should be dismissed as irrelevant.

THE COURT recalled the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor, found the pursuer's averments irrelevant, and dismissed the action.

JAMES FORD AND OTHERS (Thomson's Trustees), First Parties.—Salvesen. MRS SARAH THOMSON OR HENDERSON, Second Party.—Asher—A. S. D. Thomson.

Trust—Powers of trustees—Investments.—A truster gave a general power to his trustees to continue to hold the investments which he might have at the time of his death in any public companies, "and power to invest the funds . . . which shall devolve upon my daughter in heritage and preference stocks of railways in Scotland or England, and in the stock of Scotch banks." Held that it was competent for the trustees to hold the funds liferented by the daughter in the shape of shares in public trading companies, which were held by the testator at the time of his death, they being bound, however, to exercise their discretion from time to time as to the expediency of retaining them.

2D DIVISION. M.

WILLIAM THOMSON, died on 28th March 1889, leaving a trust-settlement wherein he provided a third of the residue of his estate to be held by his trustees for behoof of his daughter for her liferent use only, and for her children in fee.

The powers of his trustees were thus expressed:—"Power to sell the whole or any part of the estate, heritable or moveable, hereby conveyed, by public roup or private bargain, and power to continue the investments in any public companies in which I may have my capital invested at the time of my death, and power to invest the funds which shall be liferented by the said Mrs Sarah Duncan Wishart or Thomson, should she survive me, and the funds which shall devolve upon my said daughter in heritage and in preference stocks of railways in Scotland or England, and in the stock of Scotch banks, with power to renew and alter said investments at pleasure." The truster's widow died shortly after him, and the estate was for the most part distributed, the share falling to the daughter in liferent being retained by them.

This share, to the extent of £17,000, consisted of shares in public trading companies "of a more or less speculative nature," which were held by the testator at the time of his death.

The daughter, Mrs Henderson, and the trustees submitted a special case to the Court to determine whether the trustees were bound to sell these shares. The trustees stated that they had "been advised that it is doubtful whether they are entitled, under the powers conferred on them by the trust-deed, to hold any of these shares without incurring responsibility to the beneficiaries in the event of loss being occasioned to the trust-estate by reason of their doing so." They stated, however, that the companies were in good credit, and that, if it was competent for them to continue to hold the shares, they were quite willing to do so.

The daughter maintained that it was competent for the trustees to continue to hold the investments, and it was admitted that to alter them would result in a considerable diminution of income.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It is quite reasonable that the trustees should be sure of their position, but the terms of their deed are on the whole quite clear. The intention of the truster was that his trustees should continue to hold such shares in public companies as he himself held at his death. But the right to do so in no way affects their duty to look closely after these investments, and to make sure for themselves that they are reasonably safe. All that the deed will do for them is to relieve them of responsibility for holding investments of that class. I read the deed as meaning "I have certain shares in public companies, and I give my trustees power, so long as they think these investments are reasonably safe, to hold them." Our judgment will not, as I have said, relieve them of the exercise of their discretion from time to time in assuring themselves as to the soundness of those investments.

LORD YOUNG and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

THE COURT found that, "under the terms of the trust-deed, it is competent for the parties of the first part to continue to hold the shares in public companies which were held by the testator at the time of his death, but declaring that the trustees must exercise their own discretion as to the desirability, in the interests of the estate, of their continuing to hold such investments."

ALLAN A. EDMISTON (Inspector of Rutherglen), Second Party.—J. A. Reid.

Poor—Residential settlement—Married woman deserted by husband, who had no Scots settlement.—Held that a residential settlement acquired by a Scotswoman was not lost on her marriage to an Irishman who had no settlement in Scotland, and, not having been lost by absence, became available on her becoming a pauper by the desertion of her husband.

2D DIVISION. M.

IN a special case presented by John Reid, inspector of poor of Kilmarnock, and Allan Edmiston, inspector of poor of Rutherglen, the following facts were stated:—

Theresa Convery was born in 1856 in the parish of Kilmarnock.

In 1874 she became a teacher in the Roman Catholic school at Rutherglen, and resided in that parish for ten years thereafter, supporting herself by teaching in the school. By this residence she acquired for herself a residential settlement in the parish of Rutherglen.

In February 1884 she married, at Kilmarnock, John Lawrie, a native of Ireland (whose birth settlement in that country was capable of being ascertained), who did not then possess or afterwards acquire any settlement in Scotland. After the marriage Lawrie and his wife resided for ten months in Glasgow, and then they removed to Kilmarnock.

Reid v. Edmiston.

In August 1886 Lawrie deserted his wife, and on 1st April 1887, being burdened with two pupil children, she applied for and received parochial relief from the inspector of poor of Kilmarnock.

A question having arisen as to whether Kilmarnock, as the pauper's parish of birth, or Rutherglen, as the parish in which at the date of her marriage she possessed a residential settlement, was liable for her support, this special case was brought. The question of law was,—"Does the burden of supporting the pauper fall upon the parish of her birth, or upon the parish in which at the date of her marriage she possessed a residential settlement?"

Argued for the first party;—It was quite settled that where a woman with a Scots settlement married a man who had no Scots settlement, and never acquired one, and was deserted by him, she was entitled, if in poverty, to relief from her own maiden settlement.[1] But in no case was a birth parish liable if a subsequent settlement existed.[2] In the present case the subsequent residential settlement acquired by the pauper in the parish of Rutherglen still subsisted when she became chargeable, as she had not been absent from the parish for four years and a day. It was contended on the authority of Kirkwood v. Manson[3] that her marriage absolutely destroyed that residential settlement, so that it could not revive on the dissolution of the marriage. But in that case the question was expressly reserved, and the ground of decision did not touch the present case. The early editions of Professor Bell's Principles contained the doctrine that marriage only suspended a maiden residential settlement, which revived at the dissolution of the marriage. This doctrine had been assumed in Hay v. Skene,[1] Hay v. Carse,[2] and Thomson v. Knox,[4] and had also been sanctioned in England.[5] The editor of the 9th edition of Bell's Principles[6] relied solely upon Kirkwood v. Manson[3] for his statement that the doctrine was now negatived, and, as already stated, the point was in that case expressly reserved.

Argued for the second party;—Stante matrimonio a married woman could have no settlement in her own right, whether her husband had one or not.[7] The pauper's marriage had extinguished absolutely her residential settlement, and the parish of her birth was liable for her support.[3]

Lord Young.—There is no doubt that when a woman marries she takes the settlement of her husband, whatever her own settlement may have been before her marriage. The only practical difficulty which is found in applying this doctrine is, where the husband has no settlement in Scotland, or is a wanderer. If he deserts his wife in these circumstances and leaves her adrift in Scotland, what is her settlement to be? She has, like everyone else born in Scotland, a settlement of birth, and of last resort where there is no other. This must be so, or the pauper would go unrelieved altogether.

But another settlement may be, frequently is, and here was acquired, by industrial residence. In this case the settlement was acquired by industrial residence for a period of ten years, between 1874 and 1884. In the latter year the pauper's settlement of birth was entirely superseded by a residential settlement in Rutherglen properly acquired. Then she married, and her husband deserted her. He has no settlement in this country at all, and he cannot be found. Where is her settlement? It was yesterday in Rutherglen, the parish in which she had acquired a settlement by residence, but it is maintained that that settlement, which took her five years to acquire, is destroyed by her marriage, it may be for a day or a week, if her husband deserts her. No one can assent to that proposition.

I think if her husband has a settlement she will take it, but if he has none, and she has to be brought back to her own settlement, then it must be to her last settlement. I see no reason to go back upon her settlement of birth. I reject any argument which leads to the conclusion that if a woman by an industrious life has acquired a settlement, and made enough money to support herself, and then marries a blackguard who robs her, he robs her also of the settlement which she has acquired, and leaves her with the poverty which he has created to go to the parish of her birth.

That is not the law of Scotland. There is no statute nor common law sanctioning it, and every consideration of good sense is against it.

In this case, as in every other case where the husband's settlement fails, she must go to her own settlement and to her last settlement of residence. That settlement may be lost by non-residence for a period of four years and a day, but till it is so lost, it remains her settlement to which resort must be made.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK and the LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Court are of opinion that the burden of supporting the pauper falls upon the parish of Rutherglen, in which, at the date of her marriage, she had a residential settlement: Find and declare accordingly."

Liferent—Clause of forfeiture—Sale.—In a disposition and settlement of landed estate there was a destination of the subjects to one person in liferent and his issue in fee, whom failing, to certain other persons in liferent and fee respectively. The disposition also declared that all who took a beneficial right under it were "prohibited from selling, mortgaging, or otherwise disposing of such interest, excepting always sales or mortgages by parties who are absolute fiars"; such sales or mortgages were declared void, and parties signing them were to lose all their rights under the settlement, and give place to the next in succession. Held that the clauses of prohibition and forfeiture were valid and effectual to prevent a sale by the liferenter of his liferent right.

Process—Declarator—Declarator ab ante.—Held that it was competent for a liferenter, who held an estate in liferent under a disposition which provided that his liferent should be forfeited in the event of his selling it, to raise ab ante a declarator of his right to sell without incurring any forfeiture.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Kyllachy. I.

GEORGE ROBERTSON CHAPLIN, of Colliston, by a disposition and settlement, dated in 1867, conveyed certain lands to David Souter Robertson, in liferent, for his liferent right and use allenarly, and after his death to Thomas Robertson Chaplin, son of David Souter Robertson, in liferent, for his liferent right and use allenarly, and to the heirs of his body in fee, whom failing, to George Robertson Chaplin, another son of David, in liferent, for his liferent right and use allenarly, and the heirs of his body in fee, whom failing, to the heirs of the body of the said David Souter Robertson, of Lawhead, in fee, whom failing, to the heirs of the body of Mrs Margaret Souter or Kirkland, in fee.

By the same disposition Mr Chaplin conveyed other lands in similar terms to David Souter Robertson, in liferent, and to his sons George and Thomas and their issue, in liferent and fee respectively, whom failing, to Mrs Katherine Kirkland or Hoile and her issue as liferenter and fiars respectively.

By the same disposition the testator conveyed in similar terms other lands to David in liferent, and on his death to his son George in liferent and his children in fee, whom failing, to David's eldest son Stewart in liferent and the heirs of his body in fee, whom failing, &c.

Mr Chaplin died in 1869, and David Souter Robertson in 1888. Thereupon one of the sons, Thomas, succeeded to one parcel of lands in liferent, and George to two parcels in liferent.

These two sons, who were not married, conveyed their whole estates to Mr Jamieson and Mr More, as trustees for creditors, and these gentlemen proposed to sell the liferent interests of their principals in the lands above mentioned.

The disposition, however, under which the liferenters held bore to be granted under certain conditions, which were declared to be inherent qualities of the conveyance, and inter alia, under the conditions that "all parties who shall, at my death, or at any time thereafter, have any beneficial interest, contingent or otherwise, under this settlement are thereby prohibited from selling, mortgaging, or otherwise disposing of such interest, excepting always sales or mortgages by parties who are absolute fiars of any of the said estates, and it is thereby stipulated and provided that such sales or mortgages, if made, shall be void, and all deeds or instruments purporting to be a sale or mortgage of such interest, or any part thereof, shall be null and void, and all parties signing such deeds or instruments shall thereby forfeit and lose all right and benefit under this settlement, and shall give place to the next in succession who shall be entitled to come in the right and place of the party signing such deeds or instruments."

The trustees accordingly raised an action, asking for declarator that they had full right to sell and dispose of the respective liferent rights of their principals without incurring any forfeiture, and pleading;—(1) The said liferent rights not being protected against creditors, the pursuers, as trustees for behoof of creditors, are entitled to sell and dispose of the same.

They called as defenders the whole of those having interest under the deed.

Mrs Hoile and her children, and Stewart Souter Robertson (David's eldest son) and his eldest son appeared, and pleaded;—(2) The action is incompetent. (4) On a sound construction of the said disposition and settlement of the said George Robertson Chaplin, of Colliston, the liferent interests thereby respectively conveyed to the said George Robertson Chaplin, of Murlingden, and the said Thomas Robertson Chaplin, in the respective lands above mentioned, are alimentary rights not attachable by creditors, and cannot be sold, mortgaged, or otherwise disposed of without incurring the irritancy provided for in the said disposition and settlement.

Chaplins' Trustees v. Hoile.

The Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy), on 20th March, found the pursuers' averments to be not relevant or sufficient in law to support the conclusions of the action, and dismissed it.*

* "OPINION.— . . . The pursuers contend that this clause of irritancy and forfeiture is wholly ineffectual, (1) because it is not supported by a trust; and (2) because it does not strike at gratuitous alienations or the diligence of creditors, but only at sales and mortgages. They refer to the case of White, June 1, 1877, 4 R. 786, and Kirkland, March 18, 1886, 13 R. 798, as authorities in their favour, and they maintain that there is no distinction in this matter between a right of fee and a right of liferent, it being, as they contend, equally impossible in both cases to restrict the owner's power of disposal.

"The defenders, on the other hand, contend that there is nothing incompetent in the creation of a temporary interest in land which shall, in certain events, last for life, and in certain other events last for a shorter period, and that it is of no moment whether the event which brings the temporary right to a close is some outside event or some act of the party concerned. They say, for example, that a liferent may be constituted terminable on the succession to some estate, or upon marriage, or upon second marriage, and that it can make no difference in principle that it should be terminable upon, e.g., the execution of some deed, whether a deed dealing with the liferent itself, or any other deed. They admit, indeed, that if a right of fee is once given it is impossible to fetter the fiar's power of disposal, because a fee necessarily involves the power of disposal; but they say that that doctrine has no application to limited interests, which must stand or fall according to their own limitations; and in particular, that it has no application to life-rents, which are truly of the nature of burdens, and the subsistence of which may be made to depend on any conditions which the donor may choose to attach.

"The defenders further argue that in any case the forfeiture here must take effect as regards the liferents to which the trusters have only a prospective right, —that is to say, a right on the failure of the issue of each other. And with respect to the cases of White and Kirkland, they point out that those cases did not—so far as decision went—touch the present question, and that any dicta in either which may be thought to favour the pursuers' view did not really contemplate the case (which is for the first time presented here) where there is not only prohibition against alienation and a declaration that such alienation shall be null, but where it is an inherent quality of the liferent right that it shall terminate upon a sale or mortgage being attempted.

"The defenders maintain finally that the action is incompetent, in respect that it asks the Court to declare hypothetically the rights of the pursuers with respect to a course of action which they have not taken, and which they may never actually take, and they found upon the doctrine expressed in Mr Mackay's book, vol. 2, p. 93, and the case of the Earl of Galloway, 26th June 1838, 10 Scot. Jur. 524, 16 S. 121, there referred to.

"I have felt the questions thus raised to be attended with some difficulty, especially in view of the dicta expressed in the case of Kirkland, where this very deed was before the Court. But I have come to be satisfied that the question which is now presented for decision was not really considered by the Court in that case, and did not require to be considered, and, therefore, that I am bound to deal with it as one of principle, and one which is still open. In that view I have come to the conclusion that the defenders are right, and substantially upon the grounds which I have endeavoured to express as their grounds of argument.

"I do not think it necessary to proceed upon the incompetency of the action, although I have, I confess, grave doubts whether the present case does not fall within the principle of that of Galloway. But on the merits I accept the defenders' distinction between an attempt to fetter the powers of disposal inherent in the owner of a fee and a declaration, such as we have here, that a right of liferent shall terminate if a sale or mortgage of the liferent (that is to say, of the future fruits which are the subject of the liferent) shall be attempted. I only desire to guard myself by saying that I by no means regard this as implying that if a grant of liferent or of an annuity be conceived in absolute terms, the

The pursuers reclaimed, and before stating their argument intimated that it would be confined to the liferents in possession, and that they did not propose to deal with those liferents which were in spe. Their argument was as summarised by the Lord Ordinary in his note.

The defenders argued in addition to the points stated by the Lord Ordinary;—This right would not be adjudgable, for there was in the selection of the liferenter a delectus personæ of the same character as in a tack, and the right of the tacksman was not adjudgable.[1] The contrast between the rights of a fiar and of a liferenter, whereby conditions involving forfeiture could be attached to the latter but not to the former, was brought out in the case of Mason.[2] In Pirie v. Murray[3] conditions of a similar character were found attaching to an infeftment in locality lands.

LORD YOUNG.—This is an action of declarator at the instance of trustees for creditors acting under a voluntary trust-deed granted by the debtors. The trusters are entitled to the liferent of certain estates bestowed on them by the testamentary settlement of a relative, the conveyance being to them respectively for their liferent use allenarly and the heirs of their bodies in fee, whom failing, to certain other persons. The further details are unimportant to the question which was argued to us, and which we are now to decide.

The deed contains this provision,—"All parties who shall at my death, or at any time thereafter, have any beneficial interest, contingent or otherwise, under this settlement are thereby prohibited from selling, mortgaging, or otherwise disposing of such interest, excepting always sales or mortgages by parties who are absolute fiars of any of the said estates, and it is thereby stipulated and provided that such sales or mortgages, if made, shall be void, and all deeds or instruments purporting to be a sale or mortgage of such interest, or any part thereof, shall be null and void, and all parties signing such deeds or instruments shall thereby forfeit and lose all right and benefit under this settlement, and shall give place to the next in succession who shall be entitled to come in the right and place of the party signing such deeds or instruments."

The declaratory conclusion of the action at the instance of the trustees of the right can be effectually restricted by a mere declaration that it shall be alimentary, or incapable of alienation. Such a condition, I incline to agree with the pursuers, would be ineffectual, at least without the interposition of a trust; for the liferent or annuity would in that case have a fixed duration; and for its duration must be as much at the disposal of the owner as a right of fee is at the disposal of the fiar.

"With respect to the pursuers' argument that gratuitous conveyance is not struck at by the clause, and that adjudication is competent to creditors, I reserve my opinion. I do not at present, I confess, see any good answer to the pursuers' point, at least as regards the liferents in possession. But it is not necessary to decide any question of that kind here, because I see no reason in principle why a testator should not be at liberty to terminate a liferent or annuity on an attempt at sale or mortgage, and yet to leave it open to the liferenter or annuitant to alienate gratuitously, or to the creditors of the liferenter or annuitant to adjudge for debt. The testator in the present case may possibly have considered that gratuitous alienation inter vivos was not a very probable event, and may not have desired or may not have seen his way to exclude the diligence of creditors. . . ."

liferenters is that they are at liberty, this clause notwithstanding, to realise their liferents to pay creditors.

The competency of the action is objected to. I shall deal with that question after dealing with the merits, because I think my views of the merits will serve to illustrate my opinion as to the competency of the action.

The action, I think, must be dealt with on the same grounds, and must be determined on the same considerations, as if it had been brought by the trusters themselves. I cannot distinguish between the position of the liferenters and that of their trustees; every argument which was addressed to us for the trustees is equally available to their principals, and equally forcible in their mouths. I have thought through the matter as well as I am able, and I cannot see any argument available to the trustees which is not equally good—or bad—in the mouths of their principals.

The chief argument in support of their liberty to realise their liferent interest, and of the contention that the clause is ineffectual, is the repugnancy which arises from bestowing on a person an estate, and declaring at the same time that he shall not be able to deal with it as he pleases. If the estate is given, it is said, the person taking it must be able, within the limits of that estate, to deal with it as he pleases. It is quite settled, both here and in England, that, where the whole estate is bestowed on a person, any limitation on the right to use it is void for repugnancy. That is true with respect to all kinds of property; it is obviously true of a sum of money; and it is as true of all other kinds of estate. If you give it without reversion or remainder to anyone else such restrictions are void for repugnancy.

But the same rule is not applicable, the same considerations are not applicable, to a partial or particular estate in a subject, i.e., an estate with a residue or remainder to other persons. That, again, is obviously true with regard to money. Take, again, the instance of a lease. That is an estate given for a number of years. It may be exceedingly valuable. It may be more valuable than the fee; it often is. It is an immediate enjoyment. But the rule as to prescribing terms upon which it is to be held is not at all the same as in the case of a right of fee. You may prescribe in the case of a lease any terms you please; you may say that, on certain events happening, the interests of others shall come in. There is no inconsistency there between the gift and the conditions as to the termination of it.

Now, a liferent is a limited estate, a partial estate. It does not exhaust the whole property; there is a reversion or remainder over to other persons. There is therefore nothing to prevent the condition that this particular limited estate shall terminate earlier in certain events than the end of the life of the person enjoying it. One illustration is a liferent given to a widow on condition that she does not marry a second time. That is not void for repugnancy. There is another estate in existence, through the medium of which the restriction will be enforced. You give the fee to someone else, and, on the occurrence of the event provided for, it comes into play. It is the same with the gift of the interest of money.

The case, then, we have to deal with here is a case of that kind. There are two estates created and given to two different people—the liferent use is given to the liferenters, the fee is given to their issue, and failing them to other people. That fee is brought sooner into operation in certain events.

The testator's purpose was to secure the liferent income of the land to the liferenter, and to prevent him from anticipating—i.e., capitalising—it, which the testator thought would not be for his interest. The mode he took of effecting this was to prohibit it being capitalised, and to create another interest—the fee—through the medium of which he thought his intention could be carried out.

The competency of that course is here in question. Now, I think that this was a legitimate purpose, viz., to prevent the liferenter from anticipating, capitalising, or realising their rights. I do not consider—it is not my duty to consider—whether means of baffling that purpose exist. Of course a person can never be completely protected. So soon as he draws his interest at any term it is free from the prohibition, for it then becomes his absolute property. But if the liferenter cannot sell or pledge to creditors his right, moneylenders and others will be slow to minister to his demands, and that is a very considerable protection.

The moment a proposal to sell is made the fiars spring to the front, and say, "our rights are now in possession." The terror of the forfeiture will prevent a sale. That is the operation of the clause, and I think it is valid and effectual to prevent a sale.

That leads me to consider the competency of the action. The question as to the validity and the operation of this restriction is a very fitting subject for a declarator. The liferenters are excusably uncertain as to their rights, as to whether this clause is effectual to prevent a sale. The proposition that they must test their rights by experiment, with the possible result of incurring a forfeiture, is an idle proposition. As I said at first, the same is true of the trustees. They also are entitled to know whether they are at liberty to sell without incurring a forfeiture.

I think that the action is quite competent, and on the merits I am of the opinion which I have already stated.

What creditors might do in the way of realising the estate I am not called on to determine, but I may say that I have the greatest possible doubt whether creditors, who can only take through their debtor, could sell. Of course they may pick up everything as it falls due. But, on the other hand, if you have a direction that on certain conduct by the liferenter the estate shall pass to someone else, that I do not doubt is lawful, and is effectual.

Lord Rutherfurd Clark.—The question is, whether the pursuers can sell the liferents into which they have been assigned and give a good title to a purchaser, or whether the sale will be void by reason of the prohibition to sell and the resolution of the liferents in the event of a sale.

It was conceded that these conditions would be ineffectual to prevent a fiar from selling. And the pursuers contended that conditions which were of no force in the case of a fee must be ineffectual in the case of a liferent. They urged that though the rights are different in their nature they are both equally absolute and equally transferable.

There is a very obvious reason why a prohibition to sell though fenced by a resolutive clause cannot prevent a fiar from selling. The seller transfers the estate to the buyer so that the former is entirely divested, and the latter is fully vested in the fee without being affected by any of the conditions which are personal to the seller. For we are dealing with a case where there is no irritant clause, and I have not to enter on the vexed question whether the occurrence of such a clause would make any difference at common law. The result is that after his infeftment the buyer is the owner, and uses not the rights of the seller, which have been extinguished, but his own.

No. 8.

Chaplins' Trustees v. Hoile.

A liferent is no doubt transferable, but the rights resulting from the transference are very different from those resulting from the transference of a fee. I shall avail myself of the language and authority of Pothier to explain the effect of selling a liferent. He says,—"A liferenter can sell his right of liferent; but this sale comprehends rather the emolument which the right of liferent can produce than the right itself, for this right being a right attached to the person of the liferenter cannot be transferred. Consequently the right of liferent subsists in the person of the liferenter notwithstanding that he has sold. The buyer only acquires the emolument of this right, and the power of reaping the fruits in the place of the liferenter so long as the liferent endures"—Pothier, Tr. de Vente, part 6, ch. 3, art. 3, sec. 549. By the sale of the fee the right of the seller is extinguished. The sale of a liferent produces no such result. The liferent continues to exist in order that the buyer may obtain the benefit of his purchase, and in order to do so he uses the rights of the liferenter, so that as soon as the liferent ceases the right of the buyer is necessarily at an end.

It is a quality of the liferents which we are considering that the liferenters are forbidden to sell, and that if they do sell the liferents are resolved. But the resolution of the right of the liferenter at once determines the right of the buyer, which can only exist so long as the liferent subsists. The qualities and conditions inherent in the liferent necessarily affect the buyer because they are inseparable from it.

There remains, however, the argument that the prohibition is of no force as being repugnant to the nature of the right conferred on the liferenter. The pursuers say that the disposition of Mr Robertson Chaplin conveyed a full and absolute liferent, and that the limitation effected by the prohibition against sale and consequent forfeiture is repugnant to such a right.

I do not see why the granter of a liferent is not entitled to fix the conditions on which it shall continue to subsist. He can undoubtedly make it terminate on the occurrence of certain events, as, for instance, on the liferenter entering into a second marriage or succeeding to a particular estate. Why shall he not be able to make it terminate on a sale? If he is entitled to give a liferent which will determine on the occurrence of a certain event, I think that he may make it to determine on the occurrence of any.

Nor is this a matter without interest to the granter in connection with the rights of the fiars. For though it may be said that the powers of the original liferenter and the purchaser are necessarily the same it does not follow that they will be exercised in the same way. The only interest which a purchaser could have would be to make as much out of the liferent as he possibly could. Probably the full purpose of the granter has not been attained because gratuitous alienation is not prohibited. But that is no reason for not giving effect to the conditions which he has imposed so far as they go.

It was not maintained on the part of the pursuers that the defenders had no title to enforce the forfeiture of the liferents. Nor do I think that there is any room for such a plea. For by declaring that the persons so forfeiting their liferent shall give place to the next in succession the testator has raised a title to enforce the forfeiture, though probably no such express declaration was necessary. The pursuers further contended that the diligence of creditors was not excluded, and that therefore they should be allowed to do directly what the creditors might do indirectly. I think it very doubtful if the diligence of creditors is excluded. That is, however, a question which I cannot decide in this case. But assuming that the diligence of creditors is not excluded, and that they can proceed with it in ordinary form, I do not think that we can pronounce in favour of a power of sale. For creditors could not sell. They could only adjudge and acquire the liferent as their own by obtaining a decree of expiry of the legal. If they afterwards sold, they would be selling in their own right and not in the right of the liferenters, although no doubt the right of the liferenters would be the subject of sale. It is obvious that the rights of creditors are in no degree commensurate with the powers which the pursuers claim.

Oct. 30, 1890. Chaplins' Trustees v. Hoile.

Nor can the pursuers obtain any aid by referring to the possibility of sequestration. There is no sequestration, and we cannot determine in this action what the powers of a trustee may be.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be adhered to.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am of the same opinion, and it is unnecessary for me to say much after the clear and elaborate judgments which have been delivered by your Lordships.

The condition on which the liferenter is alone entitled to hold the liferent is one which the truster had a perfect right to impose. The clause imposing it is not at all, as regards its effect, in the same position as an irritant clause in a gift of fee would be. The right of one who takes by transference from a fiar is, as Lord Rutherfurd Clark has pointed out, quite different from the right of one who takes by transference from a liferenter. The fiar transferring can by his transference make another a fiar, but the liferenter cannot make his transferee a liferenter. All he can transfer is his own claim to receive the proceeds of an estate for his own life. If, then, the condition on which he holds that claim is inconsistent with any gift by him receiving effect, his transferee can be in no better position, and the limitation imposed upon the right, by one who had a right to impose it, must receive effect.

THE COURT adhered.

EGLINTON CHEMICAL COMPANY, LIMITED, Complainers (Reclaimers).—Asher—Salvesen.

WILLIAM DAVID M'JANNET (Procurator-Fiscal to Dean of Guild Court in Irvine), Respondent.—J. Comrie Thomson—W. C. Smith.

Burgh—Dean of Guild—Jurisdiction.—Held (dub. Lord Young) that the Dean of Guild has jurisdiction to require the plans of all new buildings proposed to be erected within burgh to be laid before his Court, although such buildings may be entirely within the enclosed property of the person who is erecting them, and at such a distance from the outside boundaries of it as not to threaten any encroachment on neighbouring properties or danger to persons using the public thoroughfares.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Wellwood. M.

THE facts of this case were thus stated by the Lord Ordinary in his opinion, viz.:—

"Under ancient royal charters, and, in particular, under a charter by Robert II., of date about 1373, there is conferred upon the royal burgh of Irvine and the burgesses thereof,—'The liberty of guild as other burghs and burgesses of our kingdom have and were wont to have that liberty, and that they may appoint guild brethren in the said burgh of Irvine who shall enjoy, and shall be reckoned to enjoy, every liberty of guild that others whatsoever burgesses of our kingdom hitherto have enjoyed.'

"Under the Irvine Burgh Act, 1881, 44 and 45 Vict. c. lxxi., it is provided, section 53,—'The Dean of Guild shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, have and exercise within the extended burgh all the jurisdiction, powers, and privileges possessed or exercised by the Dean of Guild in any royal burgh in Scotland, and all the jurisdiction, powers, and privileges conferred on him by this Act.'

"The Act contains, in sections 53-65, various regulations and provisions as to the powers of the Dean of Guild, some of them being simply declaratory of powers inherent in the Dean of Guild of a royal burgh, and others being conferred on him by the statute. In the latter class are some of the powers conferred by the 54th section of the statute, which provides that all proceedings under the General Police Act, as modified by the Irvine Burgh Act, with respect to improving streets, removing obstructions, public sewers, &c., may be taken either before the magistrates or before the Dean of Guild. See in particular sections 158-168, 190-194, and 348 and 349 of the General Police Act, 1862.

"Under section 59 of the Burgh of Irvine Act it is provided that proceedings before the Dean of Guild in pursuance of the Act shall commence by an application in writing or in print, or partly in writing and partly in print, and, except when otherwise specially directed, the subsequent steps may be in writing or viva voce, as shall be ordered by the Dean of Guild. 'In all other respects the procedure before the Dean of Guild in pursuance of this Act shall be in the form and subject to the regulations applying to the proceedings before the Dean of Guild in royal burghs in Scotland.'

"By section 65 it is provided that the Dean of Guild may from time to time frame rules for the procedure before the Dean of Guild Court, and tables of fees to be exacted in that Court, and bye-laws for the enforcement of such rules by penalties or otherwise, and the recovery of such fees; provided always that none of such rules, table of fees, or bye-laws shall have any force until approved of by the corporation and confirmed by the Sheriff.

"In virtue of the powers conferred by section 65 of the Act, the Dean of Guild framed bye-laws, rules, regulations, and forms of procedure, a copy of which is No. 12 of process, which were duly approved of by the provost, magistrates, and councillors of the burgh on 4th May 1886, and by the Sheriff of the county on 2d July of the same year.

"Those rules and regulations are supplementary to the statutory provisions as to the mode in which the jurisdiction, powers, and authority of the Dean of Guild are to be exercised and enforced.

"The second rule is as follows:—'No building operations of any kind shall be allowed to be erected, added to, or altered within the burgh, unless plans thereof have previously been submitted to and approved of by the Dean of Guild's Court of the burgh.'

"The present process of suspension is brought by the complainers, the Eglinton Chemical Company, Limited, for the purpose of having set aside a conviction or judgment pronounced by the Dean of Guild of the burgh of Irvine on the 27th December 1888, by which the Dean of Guild convicted the complainers of having contravened the rule just quoted, in so far as they erected a tannery or other building without plans thereof having been previously submitted to and approved of by the Dean of Guild Court of the said burgh, or having applied for or obtained the sanction of the Dean of Guild of the said royal burgh of Irvine to the said operations, and accordingly fined the complainers in the sum of £5 sterling of penalty."

The complainers pleaded;—(1) The said Court having no jurisdiction over the complainers in reference to the buildings in question, the said decree was ultra vires, and the complainers are therefore entitled to suspension and interdict as prayed for.

The respondent pleaded;—(3) The proceedings in the Dean of Guild Court having been regular, and within its jurisdiction and powers, the note should be refused with expenses.

It appeared that in 1888 the complainers, who had large chemical works within the burgh of Irvine, were desirous of making an addition to them in the shape of a tannery. This involved the alteration of an existing building, which had previously been used as a store, and the erection of a new building in continuation of it. The main part of the new building as subsequently erected was 55 feet in length, 17 feet 6 inches to the top of the walls, and 31 feet from the floor to the ridge of the roof. In addition to this building there was what is called a lean-to, extending 40 feet further in length. In addition to the erection of the new building, the walls of an old building against which it was erected had to be underbuilt to a certain extent, an operation requiring some care. The new building was at the nearest point 65 feet distant from the nearest boundary of the complainers' property. The total cost of erecting and fitting up the tannery amounted to £405. The roof of the tannery was a distinct ridge from the roofs covering the complainers' other buildings.

The Lord Ordinary (Wellwood), on 10th April 1890, after a proof in explanation of the plans produced, sustained the third plea for the respondent, and repelled the reasons of suspension.*

* "OPINION.— . . . It will thus be seen that the building operations contemplated and carried out were considerable, and during the argument I did not understand it to be disputed that if those building operations had been conducted on the verge of the complainers' property, the complainers would have required to obtain the sanction of the Dean of Guild. But they maintain that his sanction was not required in the circumstances, in respect that the buildings erected were not only entirely within their own property, but at such a distance from the boundaries that they could not possibly be regarded as encroaching upon the properties of neighbouring proprietors, or as threatening danger to the public—that is to say, the outside public as distinguished from the workmen employed in the complainers' works.

"Now, the proceedings of the complainers were undoubtedly in the teeth of the letter of the rules and regulations framed by the Dean of Guild, and approved of by the corporation and by the Sheriff; and it may be doubted whether these rules and regulations can be challenged while standing unreduced. But assuming that the complainers could, without bringing a reduction of the rules and regulations, impugn them as being ultra vires of the Dean of Guild, they would have to shew clearly and conclusively that it was not within the powers of the Dean of Guild of any royal burgh to insist that in the case of new buildings plans must be lodged, and approved by him. This, I think, they have failed to do.

"The limits of the common law jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild of a royal burgh are not exhaustively defined by authority or decision. The statements of the institutional writers on the subject are scant, and the decisions of the law Courts are comparatively few. Moreover, some of the later decisions are difficult of application, because they turn upon the construction of local statutes, under which, no doubt, to a certain extent the Dean of Guild's jurisdiction at common law is declared and defined, but which also contain supplementary provisions conferring powers which he does not possess at common law; and in some cases the questions raised were complicated by the Dean of Guild's powers and duties being divided between the Dean of Guild and Police Commissioners.

The complainers reclaimed, and argued;—Their interest to object was plain, for they were frequently making alterations and improvements

"Dealing with the authorities as they stand, I do not find grounds sufficient to support the complainers' contention. The tendency of decision has no doubt been to confine the Dean of Guild's jurisdiction to matters strictly within his own province. For instance, it has been held that he has no jurisdiction at common law in regard to obstructions in public streets or simple questions of nuisance. But the regulation of all buildings within burgh, both as to their erection and their maintenance, is peculiarly his function. I know of no authority for the contention that his sanction is not required for the erection of new buildings within burgh, wherever situated. No dictum or decision to that effect was cited to me. According to general understanding, the Dean of Guild has prima facie jurisdiction in regard to all buildings within burgh, and if any grounds for restricting his powers as to them had been supposed to exist, I should have expected to have found some traces of the question having at least been raised before this.

"The complainers founded strongly upon those cases in which it was decided that the Dean of Guild's sanction is not required for internal operations; and they argued that if such operations, however dangerous, might be carried on without his sanction, new buildings erected at a distance from the boundaries of a property should equally be regarded as internal operations, and as such exempted from his supervision. There is a great deal of force in this argument, because there is no doubt that alterations upon the internal structure of a house may be attended with as much danger as the erection of a new house; but I think that the complainers' contention carries them too far. It was not disputed in the cases referred to that if, instead of altering existing buildings, the proprietor had been erecting them for the first time, he would have required the sanction of the Dean of Guild, although the erection of new buildings might not be so dangerous as the proposed alteration of existing buildings. And this, I think, shews that the reason why the Dean of Guild's sanction is not required in the case of internal alterations is because, the original building having presumably been erected with his sanction and on lines proposed by him, internal alterations are considered to be subsidiary matters with which it would be unnecessary and vexatious for him to interfere in ordinary circumstances.

"The passage from Bankton (iv. 20, 2) quoted by the complainers does not appear to me to assist them much. No doubt the main reasons given for the interference of the Dean of Guild are the prevention of encroachments on neighbouring properties, danger to the public, or the preservation of the amenity of the burgh. But I think that if the whole of the section is read it will be seen that there is no limitation as to the character or position of the buildings with which he is empowered to interfere; and his powers are certainly not expressly confined to buildings erected on the verge of a property. For instance—'This Court has likewise the sole jurisdiction in regulating buildings within borows, whether in repairing or taking down and rebuilding old buildings or erecting new ones.' And again—'Without their warrant, obtained upon citation of all parties having interest, no houses within borow can be built or demolished in whole or in part.'

"It must be kept in view that the question to be here decided is not whether the Dean of Guild would have been justified in refusing to sanction the erection of the building in question after seeing the plans proposed, but simply whether he was entitled as a preliminary to insist on having the plans submitted to him. Now, unless plans are submitted in the case of all new buildings proposed to be erected, it cannot be seen whether their erection will or will not result in encroachment on the property of the neighbours or danger to the lieges. The danger of a new building to the neighbours or to the public is a question of degree. A building erected fifty feet from the boundary might be safe in so far as neighbours or passers-by were concerned, while a building erected only at

Oct. 30, 1890. Eglinton Chemical Co., Limited, v. M'Jannet.

within their works, in which processes which they desired to keep secret were carried on. The Dean had no jurisdiction except when the public safety, i.e., the safety of persons in public places, or the private interests of neighbouring proprietors were threatened.[1] The operations here proposed were more like internal alterations on the fittings of a house, which authority had pronounced to be beyond the Dean's jurisdiction,[2] if they were not attended with danger to the lieges.

The respondent argued;—There was here a large community within the works, for about 500 or 600 workpeople were employed, and it a distance of twenty feet might be dangerous. Much, again, would depend upon the height of the building, or in the case of manufactories, on the height of the chimney. Now, all those things cannot be judged of properly without the production of plans, and I think it would seriously impair the utility of the Dean of Guild's Court if in each case a proprietor intending to build were allowed to judge for himself whether he should be required to lodge plans or not. As a matter of regulation and procedure, it is right that such a Court should have power to order plans to be lodged in all such cases.

"Further, although this question is attended with greater difficulty, I am not prepared to assent to the proposition that, where it is proposed within burgh to erect large public works, in which, as here, hundreds of the inhabitants will be employed, the Dean of Guild has no jurisdiction or right and duty of supervision in the interests and for the protection of the workmen employed. If the complainers' argument is to be carried to its logical conclusion, they would have been entitled to erect the whole of their works, excepting in so far as they abut upon neighbouring properties or public streets, without the sanction of the Dean of Guild.

"In the present case, so far as I can judge from the evidence, the tannery in question seems to have been properly and safely erected, and no danger to the public is to be anticipated; but this is judging ex post facto, and I do not think that this consideration affects the question which I have to decide.

"So far I have spoken solely of the Dean of Guild's powers at common law. But it is not immaterial to note that by the imported sections of the General Police Act he is given powers which might not be held to belong to him at common law.

"Another matter was referred to by the respondent in the course of the discussion as giving the Dean of Guild an interest and right to call for plans, viz., —the drainage of the new tannery. The complainers contended that that was a matter with which the Dean of Guild had nothing to do. Now, it is quite true that at common law the Dean of Guild is not entitled to interfere on the ground of nuisance alone. But I am disposed to think, in the first place, that where new buildings are to be erected it is a customary part of the Dean of Guild's duties and powers to satisfy himself as to the mode in which it is proposed to drain such buildings. In the present case it is not disputed that the drain from the tannery ultimately joins one of the public drains of the burgh; and this being so the Dean of Guild might, in the interest of the public, be entitled to insist upon seeing the mode in which the tannery was to be drained, and in insisting that notice should be given to any of the inhabitants who might be injuriously affected by the discharges.

"Further, under the 54th section of the Irvine Burgh Act the Dean of Guild possesses wider powers than those which he possesses at common law in regard to such matters. See in particular sections 190-194 of the General Police Act, 1862; and the 8th of the Rules and Regulations contains directions upon this very point.

"On the whole matter, I am of opinion that the reasons of suspension are not well founded, and that the note must be refused."

was well that the Dean should be consulted as to the stability of buildings where the lives or limbs of so many persons were exposed to risk. The point taken by the Lord Ordinary as to the drainage of the new buildings was also of importance. The case of the tunnel under the Mound[1] was an example of an extension of the Dean's jurisdiction beyond mere building operations. There was authority for the proposition that a house, the method of construction of which made it a nuisance, might be removed by the Dean of Guild.[2] Besides, it might very well be that there was a duty on the complainer to lodge his plans, even if on a simple inspection of these it was apparent that the Dean had no jurisdiction.[3] Otherwise the person building would be allowed to determine for himself the extent of the Dean's jurisdiction. Buchanan's case[4] was a case where no such plea as the complainers now took was taken, although it was plain that there was ground for it.

The Court having desired some information as to the practice in the Edinburgh Dean of Guild Court, they were informed from the bar that the Lord Dean was in use to exercise jurisdiction over all buildings within burgh, even although within private enclosures, excepting only the Castle buildings.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case relates to the powers of the Dean of Guild Court in the burgh of Irvine, and the exact question as raised by this suspension is whether or not the Dean of Guild has a right to require that any person within the burgh desiring to build a new building or to alter an existing building shall lay the plans before the Dean of Guild Court and get the Dean of Guild's warrant and authority.

Now, the Dean of Guild Court of Irvine is undoubtedly a Court properly constituted, because by an early royal charter the liberty of guild is given to the burgh of Irvine as to any other burgh in the kingdom, and that Dean of Guild Court so constituted is recognised by 44 and 45 Vict. cap. lxxi., which is the Irvine Burgh Act, by which it is enacted "that the Dean of Guild shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, have and exercise within the extended burgh all the jurisdiction, powers, and privileges possessed or exercised by any Dean of Guild in any royal burgh in Scotland, and all the jurisdiction, powers, and privileges conferred upon him by this Act." Therefore most undoubtedly the Dean of Guild Court of Irvine is a duly constituted Court of Guild.

The extent of the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild is of course a different question. It is not disputed by the complainers here that he has a duty of protection of the bounds of property to see that buildings that are about to be erected do not encroach beyond their own proper limits. The complainers say that in this case there was no need to have his warrant on that matter, because the outmost line of the buildings which they were erecting is 65 feet or thereby from the edge of their property. I do not see how that affects the question of whether they should have gone to the Dean of Guild Court at all. If they were able to shew to the Dean of Guild Court at once that the boundary within which they proposed to erect did not encroach, they would be entitled to a judgment from the Dean of Guild as a matter of course, so far as that matter was concerned. But if parties are to judge for themselves in that matter, one would like to know where the line is to be drawn at which they are to judge. They are first to settle where the boundary of their own property is, and then say how far they are going back from what they say is the boundary of their own property, and when they think it is far enough, and that the Dean of Guild could not possibly give a judgment against them, they are to be entitled to judge for themselves, and not apply for his warrant.

I do not think that is a sound way of dealing with a matter of this kind at all. The principle of the Court is that parties must lay their plans before the Dean of Guild Court. In many cases that may be a mere matter of form, but the question whether it is to be dealt with as a mere matter of form is a question for the Dean of Guild and not for the party; he is not to be a judge in his own case.

But taking it as a fact that there was no question here of encroachment, it certainly would not settle the question in this case, because a jurisdiction of this kind cannot possibly be satisfactorily exercised unless it is exercised before works are commenced. It would be very unsatisfactory for people who desired to object to works, or for the Dean of Guild himself who thought it his duty as a public official to object to works, or for the Police Commissioners who might think proper to object for other grounds in the public interest, and it would be most unsatisfactory for the people who proposed to execute buildings themselves, if the Dean of Guild's jurisdiction and authority were only to be invoked, after the buildings had been commenced, at the complaint of someone who had an interest or a right to object. It is in the interests of all parties that every such question that can be settled before buildings are commenced should be settled, and it would cause the greatest possible public inconvenience and the greatest possible private inconvenience if any other course were followed.

But that is true upon the footing that the question is one merely of lining, and it was argued to us on behalf of the complainers that as what the Dean of Guild had to give was a decree of lining, that was the whole question which was involved before him. I do not think so. Although the Dean of Guild may be perfectly satisfied that the boundaries are all correct, and that there is to be no encroachment either upon public or private property, and that therefore he could give a lining so far as the outside walls of the building are concerned, I think it is not his duty to issue that decree of lining and give authority to proceed merely on that ground. If there are other circumstances connected with the building which is proposed to be erected which make it improper that the person should be allowed to build the buildings as he proposes to build them, even though they are to be entirely within his own ground, the Dean of Guild may have an absolute duty to withhold his decree. Because it is quite plain, from the history of the matter, which the Lord Ordinary has given us with great care and elaboration in his note, that the Dean of Guild's jurisdiction does not extend merely to lining, but extends to the public safety and the other public interests, including in public safety the safety of the individuals on either side of the place at which the buildings are proposed to be erected. But not only so,—not only is it at common law so, according to our old customary law, that the Dean of Guild has that jurisdiction,—but by this Irvine General Burgh Act, by which the Dean of Guild of that burgh gets the powers of any Dean of Guild of a royal burgh, it is enacted that, under certain clauses of the General Police Act, which has been adopted by the burgh of Irvine, which relate to those matters which generally come under the cognisance of the Dean of Guild,—the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild or of the Magistrates, as defined in that Act, shall be applicable in the burgh. Now, those clauses of the General Police Act are very numerous, but there are a considerable number of them which plainly relate to such matters. There are clauses in reference to the setting forward or setting back of buildings for the general interest of the burgh; there are clauses relating to the drainage with a view to the health and comfort of the burgh; and there are clauses relating to the safety of party walls of buildings and to the arrangements for the ventilation of buildings.

Now, it appears to me that if all these matters are matters truly within the cognisance of the Dean of Guild of the burgh of Irvine, it is quite plain that it must be part of his duty to see the plans of buildings before they are erected, because nothing could be more inconvenient to all parties than that the intervention of the Dean of Guild should arise in matters of drainage and matters of ventilation only after the evil has been done; and of course as regards party walls for the purpose of making the buildings safe, that also is a matter which plainly ought to be attended to as a matter of plan originally—in the interests probably most of the person who is going to erect the buildings. Therefore, in my judgment, the Dean of Guild Court has a duty to act in every case, and having a duty to act, is entitled to warn the inhabitants, as is done by the regulations issued in the burgh of Irvine, which have not been in any way attacked as illegal, or reduced,—to warn them that his jurisdiction must be invoked by application to him for a warrant upon all occasions when it is proposed to erect a new building or to make alterations on an old building.

The case was treated by the complainers very much as if the Dean of Guild in these matters was a kind of irresponsible tyrant who could do what he pleased, and that if they were obliged to go to the Dean of Guild they might be subjected to any sort of injustice or unreasonable interference with the works they proposed to execute, but that is not the state of the law at all. The Dean of Guild has a responsibility to fulfil, and if he fulfils that responsibility justly and fairly, then of course all is well, but if the Dean of Guild does anything capricious or contrary to law, and does not carry out his functions according to the powers which he possesses, his judgment can be brought under review—and is constantly brought under review in this Court—and any injustice or illegality which he may commit can be put right; and, therefore, that ground on which the complainers endeavoured to maintain their case was entirely fallacious. It was suggested in the course of the debate,—I put it to the counsel for the Eglinton Chemical Company quite distinctly, and practically got the answer,—that the Dean of Guild was merely a sort of detective-officer going about seeing what was being done in the burgh, and whenever he saw something wrong, interfering and stopping the proceeding and trying to get it put right. I do not think that is the function of the Dean of Guild Court at all. The function of the Dean of Guild Court is to see and approve of all plans of buildings to be erected or altered in the burgh before these are proceeded with, and it is the duty of all citizens, under the law in the burgh of Irvine, as I believe it to be their duty practically in all the burghs in Scotland, to lay their plans before the Dean of Guild and ask for his warrant.

The only law which was quoted by the complainers against that view is contained in two cases, but I do not think that either of these cases has the slightest bearing upon this. In the first place, they were cases of a totally different kind. They did not relate to any building at all. They related entirely to certain operations which had taken place within the walls of the old building, or which were about to take place there. If the case in Dundee could be held to lay down the principle that a person without any authority could take down all the internal structure of his house and only leave the four bare walls outside without any municipal sanction, then that would be a judgment with which I could not agree, because, of course, in every building of any size a good proportion of the internal walls of the building are not merely partition walls in the strict sense, but are structural supports to the building itself. But, in that case—Speed v. Philip—there was not a failure to apply to the municipal authority. It appears that in Dundee there has been for a considerable time some conflict of jurisdiction as between the Dean of Guild Court and the Police Commissioners, and in that particular case the person who had pulled down the inside of his house had applied to the Police Commissioners and got their sanction for what he had done. He may have applied to the wrong Court, but he was certainly not in the contumacious position of having passed by the municipal authority in the matter, and further than that, he had given distinct intimation that whenever he proposed to proceed to build on the ground where he had taken down the internal part of the house, he did intend to get the Dean of Guild's warrant for his new buildings. The Court thought that in those special circumstances they were not called upon to hold that the party who owned the building was in any way in fault for what he had done, and was therefore not to be dealt with by way of punishment for what he had done. If the case went any further than that, I say again that I could not agree with the decision, but I do not think it does.

The only other case is one which occurred in this Court last year (Somerville v. M'Gregor, 17 R. 46), in which the Dean of Guild Court endeavoured to assert its jurisdiction to interfere with certain changes made in the internal arrangements of a house in London Street. These internal alterations consisted in no way of interference with the structure at all, but were simply of the nature of lath and plaster partitions—or lath and standard partitions probably—dividing off the rooms in a different way from that in which they had been divided off before. They made no difference whatever upon the strength of the structure, and could make no difference. They made no structural alteration in any respect, and on that ground we held that it was not necessary in such circumstances to invoke the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild and obtain his warrant.

It appears to me that neither of these cases—which were the only authorities cited to us on behalf of the complainers—have the slightest bearing upon this case, which is the case of an entirely new building proposed to be constructed by these complainers, and for which they did not apply for a warrant to the municipal authority at all. In my judgment, they were bound to apply to the Dean of Guild, and lay their plans before him before proceeding with the buildings, and on these grounds I have not the slightest hesitation in concurring in the judgment given by the Lord Ordinary, and in the very careful and elaborate and excellent statement he has made in his note as to the law on the subject.

Oct. 30, 1890. Eglinton Chemical Co., Limited, v. M'Jannet.

LORD YOUNG.—I must say that I think this case is attended with grave and serious difficulty, and it is with hesitation that I concur in the judgment which is about to be pronounced. The Dean of Guild's jurisdiction is, generally speaking, a common law jurisdiction, and it is, in many respects, a little vague; and I think all Deans of Guild had better take into consideration when their services are likely to be useful in the public interest, for they have no other interest, and where their interference would be merely mischievous and troublesome.

The Lord Ordinary says in his note here that he knows of no authority for the contention that his,—that is, the Dean of Guild's—sanction is not required for the erection of new buildings within burgh wherever situated. Now, I must say that I cannot affirm the proposition that the Dean of Guild's sanction is required for the erection of any building within burgh, wherever situated. One may possess a villa within burgh situated in a park of 20, 50, or 100 acres—all within burgh and with a park wall. The proposition that the proprietor could not build a cart-shed or an addition to his stable or his coach-house without resorting to the Dean of Guild—it may be a tradesman from the adjacent town who has been disappointed in his offer for the work—to sanction the plans is a proposition which does not commend itself to my mind; and I am not prepared to say that merely because this villa with the 100 acre park round it is within burgh, therefore the common law requires that the Dean of Guild should be called in to sanction any addition to the house or to the stables, or anything of the like. I do not know how he is to know—unless he happens accidentally to have been applied to as a tradesman to give an estimate for the work—what is going on within the park wall. There is no neighbouring proprietor. There is nobody complaining to him, and unless he or some other person is going about as a detective to see whether there are any buildings of that kind going on, I do not know how he is to ascertain the fact.

Now, that is not according to our practice. I think our practice—the practice which is really the common law—is that an application to the Dean of Guild is necessary where the intended erections are in the immediate vicinity of a public place or of neighbours who may have an interest to object. I think in all these cases judgment and discretion require to be exercised, and ought to be exercised, by the Dean of Guild to begin with, and by us on appeal, if recourse is taken here to know whether he has acted reasonably and sensibly, or has gone out of his way. The Dean of Guild will generally be considerably under the influence of the permanent officials of such an establishment; I think there is judgment and discretion required of him and his officials to begin with, and that we must exercise it upon appeal to us in any particular case.

Now, I have put by way of illustration a case within burgh, and technically and really within the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild, in which I think his interference would be outrageous, that he would be making himself a perfect nuisance, and ought to be restrained in continuing any such course of conduct. I put a case illustrative of that. Here the circumstances are different, but I think we have, as a matter of judgment and discretion, to consider whether the Dean of Guild exercised a just judgment which involves a just discretion in interfering here, and it is there that I have very grave doubts indeed, although I have come in the end to the conclusion that I ought not to state a dissent to what I understand will be the judgment, concurring with the Lord Ordinary.

declare, that if, in any year from Whitsunday to Whitsunday, the said annual income or produce shall not amount to £250 sterling, then, and in that event, I direct my trustees to make payment to my said wife of such a sum out of the capital of my estate as will, when added to said annual income or produce for said year, make the sum paid to my said wife during said year £250 sterling."

He disposed of the fee after the death or second marriage of his wife, and then gave his trustees powers of investment in these terms, viz., "to invest the trust-funds in the purchase or on the security of lands, houses, feu-duties, or ground-annuals, or other heritable property, or in the shares or stock or bonds or mortgages of any incorporated companies, or public trusts in Great Britain or Ireland, or in the preference stock of any railway company in Great Britain or Ireland where the ordinary stock of such railway company has on the average of three years preceding the date of such investment paid not less than two per centum per annum, and to call up, realize, and change the said investments from time to time, to continue any investments I may have made, even although such investments may not be such as my trustees would, under the provisions hereof, be entitled to make."

The widow on 11th February 1890 raised an action against the trustees in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire for two sums of £25, 8s. 6d. and £11, 9s. 4d., being the amounts of two accounts paid by the trustees to their law-agents from the gross revenue in May 1887 and in May 1888.

The pursuer averred that these accounts were for professional work done by the defenders' agents "in connection with the management of the trust and the investment of the funds thereof," and had been wrongfully deducted from the revenue instead of from the capital of the estate.

The defenders stated;—"The law expenses incurred in executing the trust up to the time when the residue was ascertained and invested were paid by the defenders out of the gross capital of the estate.. The two accounts in process—the amounts of which are sued for—are the law-agent's accounts for the subsequent ordinary management of the trust affairs."

The pursuer pleaded that the sums had been retained from revenue in violation of the terms of the trust-deed.

The defenders pleaded;—(2) The accounts in question being for ordinary trust management, formed proper charges against the revenue of the estate.

It appeared from the accounts that the material portions had been incurred with reference to changes in investments.

The Sheriff-substitute (Guthrie), on 20th March 1890, after findings as to the terms of the deed, found "that these directions import that the residue is to be ascertained after payment of the whole expenses of the trust of every kind, including such outlays as those connected with the renewal of investments from time to time; and that the pursuer is therefore not bound to suffer deduction from her liferent of the accounts condescended on, but that the same fall to be paid from the capital held by the trustees: Therefore decerns as craved."*

* "NOTE.—It would perhaps be more convenient, as a question of accounting, if the opposite view to that embodied in the interlocutor were taken. But it is not, I think, authorised by the terms of the trust-deed, which gives the law of the case. The pursuer is made liferentrix of the residue, and is to receive at once the free annual proceeds of it. And the residue is by the clear intention of the deed what remains 'after fulfilling the foregoing purposes,' one of which is payment of 'the expenses of every kind connected with the execution of the

No. 10.

The trustees appealed, and argued;—The directions in the first purpose of the deed had reference merely to the initial expenses of the trust. The direction to pay the "free" annual proceeds to the widow implied that some deductions were to be made from the gross annual income, and no deductions were more reasonable than those necessary to secure a proper return from the trust-estate. A change of investment was in the interest of the liferenter, for the fiar would be content to leave the money in consols. The trust, indeed, existed for the liferenter only, in proof of which it was certain that when her liferent was over the trust would come to an end.

Argued for the widow;—By the terms of the deed these expenses fell upon the capital. The language of the first purpose was very wide, and "free" proceeds contemplated nothing more than the deduction of the expense of collecting the income. The trust existed for the fiars and not for the liferenter; to keep the estate safe from the possibility of dilapidation by the liferenter. Besides, the fiars as well as the liferenter were interested in a good return being obtained for the money, for if the income fell short of £250 in any year the deficiency was to be made good to the widow out of capital.

At advising,—

Lord Justice-Clerk.—In this case the question arises whether certain expenses incurred, for the most part, in so far as at all material, with reference trust hereby created.' I can put no other meaning on these words than that the pursuer's right to the free annual proceeds of the residue is not to be burdened with the expenses of management, which are expenses connected with the execution of the trust—except in so far as the residue of the capital sum is from time to time diminished by the payment of such expenses.

"The two cases cited by both parties as bearing on this question do not appear to be decisive. In the later case, Baxter & Mitchell v. Wood, 2 Macph. 915, 36 Scot. Jur. 460, there is no statement of the terms of the trust; and indeed the case rather turns upon general principles applying to circumstances different from those of the present case. In the other, Pearson v. Casamajor, 2 D. 1020, 12 Scot. Jur. 494, principles are laid down which are referred to by Professor Montgomerie Bell (Conveyancing, 943, second edn., 950 third edn.), as 'useful in general practice.' But it rather seems that Professor Bell regarded them as referring to the case where the trust-deed is silent on the subject. I am not sure that in the case of Pearson the trust-deed was silent; for its terms are more fully given in the House of Lords Report in 2 Rob. 218, than in either of the Court of Session Reports (15 S. and 2 D.), and seem to have been not unlike the first purpose of the deed now before me. But the clauses disposing of residue were there entirely different from the present deed, and afforded no such distinct indication of intention as we find in the terms and collocation of its directions.

"No distinction was made in argument between the various charges in the accounts in process; and I have dealt with the accounts on the footing that they apply entirely to work connected with changes in investments. According to the usual and proper practice in the management of trust-estates where the trust-deed is silent or less distinct than it is here, such expenses, as I have always understood, are charged against capital; and if that course—as explained by Professor Montgomerie Bell and the Lord Ordinary (Moncreiff) in Pearson v. Casamajor—had been followed, the pursuer would very probably have raised no question as to minor and ordinary charges, if there be any such. But the trustees' directions are here so special that it would be difficult to allow even expenses of ordinary management, such as factor's commission, to be deducted from the annual proceeds of the residue in the event of that smaller question being raised."

to changes in trust investments, fall on the liferent of the widow, or are to be deducted from the capital of the estate.

Of course trust expenses may fall into two or, perhaps, three categories. They may distinctly be expenses falling on the capital, or they may be mere expenses of collecting the income, or they may be such expenses as are involved in calling and holding the meetings of the trustees, which will in all likelihood fall, if strictly examined, partly under one and partly under the other of the two former heads.

But, as I have said, the main expense we have to deal with here is the expense incurred in uplifting investments, and in finding new investments for the funds so uplifted, and in investing the funds when suitable opportunities present themselves.

For some time the trustees here have been in the habit, in perfect bona fides, of deducting those expenses from the income of the widow, but she now demands that they should be repaid to her.

It is important to see what the powers of the trustees as to expenses are. Now, the first purpose of the trust is in these words, viz. :—"I direct my trustees to pay all my just and lawful debts, sick-bed and funeral expenses, and the expenses of every kind connected with the execution of the trust hereby created."

Occurring in that place, these words might be read as referring merely to the expense of putting the trust into operation. That is a possible reading of them, but, looking at the whole terms of the deed, I am of opinion that they cover all the expenses of the trustees in performing their trust duty. The trust contemplates a tract of time. There is a liferent provided to the widow, and the subsistence of that liferent may involve a continuance of the trust for a long time. The expense incurred in the discharge of the trust duty of seeing to the safety of investments, and of improving them from time to time, is therefore as much an expense of the trust as the initial expense of setting it in operation.

Then the widow is to receive "the free annual produce of the" residue, and it was argued that "free" means "whole"—that the income is not to be diminished in any way. I am not clear that that is so; I think it may very fairly mean what remains after deducting the expense of collection. That, however, is a trifling matter. The expense which raises the question here is the expense of considering the state of the investments from time to time, and of making such alterations on them as the trustees may consider expedient.

If these expenses are deducted from the capital the burden of them, it is obvious, will affect the interests both of fiar and liferenter. I find nothing inequitable in that.

Dealing, then, with this case on the words of the deed, I think that the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute is sound.

LORD YOUNG.—I concur, but I wish to say a word or two with reference to the future administration of this trust as well as to the past. I should also like to say that I should have arrived at the same conclusion irrespective of the words of the deed.

After the trustees realised the truster's property they got £12,000, and their duty was to invest that for behoof of the truster's widow in liferent, and certain parties in fee.

Irrespective of any words in the trust-deed about paying expenses, I should have held it clear on the rules of common law that the charge of realising the estate—turning it into money to begin with, and then investing that money suitably—was a proper charge upon capital. I do not know that that was disputed. The original investment of £12,000 cannot last. It frequently is the duty of trustees in the interest of all the beneficiaries, fiars as well as liferenters, to change the investment. Sometimes they cannot help it. The debtors pay up, and the investment must be changed. But on the rules of the common law, irrespective of any special provision on the subject, when trustees require to change investments of trust funds held by them for fiars and liferenters, the charges are charges on the capital—not only the original investment, but all proper changes by the trustees in the discharge of their duty.

No. 10.

Oct. 30, 1890. Smith v. Bennie.

We were told that the trustees had been frequently assailed by the widow, and requested by her to get more profitable investments with a view to increasing her liferent, and that they exerted themselves for that purpose, and changed the investments frequently, and that at an expense of, I think, £30 in seven years. I think their duty was this: With respect to all investments which they thought proper to make, and which were not solely for the widow's own immediate interest, but for that of the fiar as well, they ought to have paid the charges out of capital. If, on the other hand, they changed the investments for behoof of the widow exclusively, without prejudice to the fiar, they should have stipulated beforehand with the widow that she should pay the expense in connection with the investments. As I said in the course of the argument, there was nothing to prevent the trustees from investing the trust-estate in the Funds and giving her only the interest of it. I must say that if this expense was really incurred by the changing of investments at the request of the widow, I cannot commend the good taste of the action. But nothing is stated of the kind on record. I agree in the view that the investments must be taken as having been made unavoidably, or in discharge of the duty of the trustees, in the interest of both parties, and therefore that the charges in connection with the investments must be charges against capital.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

THE COURT refused the appeal.

Jurisdiction—Review—Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. cap. 74), sec. 30 (7)—Animals Order, 1886, sec. 179—Compensation for slaughtered animals—Local Authority.—By the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878, the Local Authority may, in the case of an outbreak of disease, slaughter the whole cattle composing the herd, whether infected or not, giving the owner compensation as therein provided.

The 30th section of the Act enacts that the Local Authority may, if they think fit, withhold compensation either wholly or partially "in respect of an animal slaughtered . . . by their . . . order, where the owner . . . has, in their . . . judgment, been guilty, in relation to the animal, of an offence," as defined in section 61 (1) of the Act.

Held that to justify a Local Authority in withholding compensation for an animal slaughtered it is necessary that they should ascertain and determine that the offence has been committed, and that such determination should be recorded in the minutes, and that it is not necessary that the outbreak of disease should be traceable to the offence.

Calder v. Local Authority of Linlithgow.

In an action against a Local Authority, by the owner of cattle slaughtered by their order, for compensation, the Local Authority founded on a minute of meeting after the date of the action in which they stated their opinion "that the pursuer had not adduced any reason to induce the Authority to pay compensation for these animals in regard to which it is alleged that an offence had been committed" and resolved to withhold compensation, and pleaded that the jurisdiction of the Court was excluded.

The Court, in respect that the minute did not state that the defenders had ascertained and determined that the offences had been committed, adjourned the case to allow them to supply this defect in their determination, and on a subsequent minute of meeting being produced, setting forth a finding by them that the offences had been committed and their resolution to withhold compensation, the Court sustained the plea of no jurisdiction.

Lord Trayner.
C.

JAMES CALDER, distiller, Bo'ness, kept a large stock of cows, one of which, in the beginning of September 1889, was seized with pleuro-pneumonia. It was accordingly slaughtered, along with all the other cows in the same herd,—numbering forty-six,—by orders of the Local Authority of the district of the county of Linlithgow, in terms of the provisions of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Acts, 1878 to 1886, and the Order in Council of 1888.*

The forty-six cows were valued by the Local Authority for the purposes of compensation under the same Acts † at £736, 10s., and this sum, along with £10, 10s. compensation for the slaughter of the diseased animal and £7, 14s. 9d. expenses incurred in connection with the disinfection of the premises, burial of carcases, &c., was now sued for by Calder in an action at his instance against the Local Authority—the summons in which was dated 16th January 1890.

The defenders offered to pay the pursuer £377, 10s. in respect of the cattle slaughtered, and £4, 6s. 8d. of expenses. The £377, 10s. was made up of payment in full for fifteen healthy cows slaughtered, and of three-fourths of the value of eleven which were said to be diseased (including the £10, 10s. claimed for the first one slaughtered). With regard to the remaining twenty-one, which went to make up the forty-seven, the defenders stated that the pursuer, or the person having charge of them on the pursuer's behalf, had committed offences either against the Act itself or against regulations framed by them under section 20 of the Animals Order of

* The Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878, sec. 21 (1), enacts,—"A Local Authority shall cause all cattle affected with pleuro-pneumonia to be slaughtered within two days after the existence of the disease is known to them."

The Pleuro-Pneumonia Slaughter Order of 1888, sec. 1 (1), provides,—"A Local Authority shall cause all cattle being, or having been, in the same field, shed, or other place, or in the same herd, or otherwise in contact with cattle affected with pleuro-pneumonia, to be slaughtered within ten days after the fact of their having been so in contact has been ascertained, or within such further period as the Privy Council may in any case direct."

† The Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878, sec. 21 (3), enacts,—"The Local Authority shall, out of the local rate, pay compensation as follows:—For cattle slaughtered under this section (1) where the animal slaughtered was affected with pleuro-pneumonia, the compensation shall be three-fourths of its value immediately before it became so affected, but so that the compensation do not in any such case exceed £30."

The Slaughter Order of 1888, sec. 2 (1), provides,—"The Local Authority shall, out of the local rate, pay compensation as follows for cattle slaughtered under the authority of this order:—The compensation shall be the value of the animal immediately before it was slaughtered, but so that the compensation do not in any case exceed £40."

1886, breaches of which were by the provisions of section 61 (1) of the Act of 1878 declared to be offences against that Act. These offences consisted (1) in moving cows from places outside the defenders' district into their district without declarations required by the defenders' regulations, or under false declarations; or (2) under declarations imperfectly attested. Accordingly they withheld compensation, in terms of the subjoined provisions of the statute,* but gave the pursuer an opportunity of making representations respecting the circumstances alleged.†

The pursuer stated in reference to these alleged offences,—"The cows with regard to which the offences were charged were not said by the defenders to be, and in point of fact were not, the same cows as those for the slaughter of which compensation is now refused. The said charges, which are referred to, were in themselves frivolous and purely technical, and it was not even pretended by the defenders that these alleged offences had any connection whatever with the outbreak of pleuro-pneumonia. The pursuer did not know, and the defenders did not suggest that he knew, that there was any pleuro-pneumonia among his cows until the beginning of September 1889, when he at once sent information to the Local Authority." And he further averred that in rejecting the pursuer's claim for compensation, "the defenders were acting outwith the statute, and their conduct was characterised by malice and oppression."

* The Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878, sec. 30, parag. 7, enacts,—"Notwithstanding anything in this Act, the Privy Council or a Local Authority, as the case may be, may, if they think fit, withhold, either wholly or partially, compensation or other payment in respect of an animal slaughtered under this Act by their respective order, where the owner or the person having charge thereof has, in their respective judgment, been guilty in relation to the animal of an offence against this Act, or where the animal, being a foreign animal, was, in their respective judgment, diseased at the time of its landing."

The Animals Order of 1886, sec. 179, provides,—"A Local Authority before determining, under paragraph 7 of section 30 of the Act of 1878, to withhold, either wholly or partially, compensation or other payment in respect of an animal slaughtered by their order, shall give to the owner of the animal an opportunity of making representations to them respecting the facts and circumstances of the case, and shall consider the same."

† The statement which Mr Calder had been called upon to answer was dated 31st January 1890, and contained details of the alleged "offences,"—nine in number,—applicable to thirty cows, the majority of which were committed between 9th January and 27th June 1889.

In his answers to the statement the pursuer pointed out that the first complaint was dated 21st November 1889, and was only intimated after the claim for compensation had been made, and more than six months subsequent to 9th January when the alleged offence was committed; that the outbreak of disease in September 1889 could not be connected with the movement of cattle some months previously; that the attestations had probably been regarded by his servants as mere formalities, or that they occurred in cases where attestors could not conveniently be got, and were therefore to be regarded as mere inadvertencies. He further pointed out that it had not been shewn that the cows, or any of them, were the cows with reference to which the Local Authority were refusing to pay compensation.

The following was the minute of meeting of the Local Authority, held on 5th May 1890, so far as regarded the statement and answers:—"The meeting having considered the answers for Mr Calder to the queries put to him by the Local Authority, along with the report of the Bo'ness Committee thereanent, were of opinion that Mr Calder had not adduced any reason to induce the Authority to pay compensation for those animals in regard to which it is alleged that an offence had been committed, and resolved to withhold compensation for the following animals accordingly" (twenty-one in number).

Calder v. Local Authority of Linlithgow.

The defenders' answer to this statement was,—(Ans. 8) "The defenders, by their clerk, examined on several occasions the byre-book of the pursuer, and made other inquiries as to the identity of the cows for which compensation is refused with those with regard to which offences were committed. The pursuer in his answer to the defenders' statement does not deny their identity. In the judgment of the defenders the pursuer was guilty of offences against the statute, or against regulations framed by the defenders under the Animals Acts aforesaid, with reference to the twenty-one cows slaughtered by them, for which compensation is now refused, and it is on account of their opinion to that effect that compensation is withheld. This judgment and determination was arrived at after the defenders had given the pursuer an opportunity of making representations to them respecting the facts and circumstances of each case, and after they had considered the same."

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(5) The defenders' actings having been outwith the said Act, and having been characterised by malice and oppression, the jurisdiction of the Court is not excluded.

The defenders pleaded;—(3) The jurisdiction of the Court being excluded by the provisions of the said Act, the present action is incompetent.

The Lord Ordinary (Trayner), on 19th June 1890, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that in exercise of their statutory powers the defenders have determined that as regards the twenty-one cows for which they have refused compensation the pursuers have been guilty of offences against the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878, and that such determination is conclusive: Finds that in consequence of said determination the pursuer has no claim for compensation for said twenty-one cows which can be enforced in this action: Assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the summons in so far as concerns compensation sought for said twenty-one cows, and decerns: Quoad ultra allows the parties a proof of their respective averments," &c.*

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The statute, sec. 21 (3), gave an absolute right to compensation for cattle slaughtered in terms of its provisions. It was true, sec. 30 (7), that there was an exception in the case of an animal where the owner had been guilty "in relation to it of an offence" against the Act. Nothing of this kind had been proved here. The cattle, in regard to which it had been stated by the Local Authority that offences had been committed, had not been identified as the same cattle as those

* "OPINION.—The pursuer sues, inter alia, for compensation on account of forty-six cows belonging to him which were slaughtered by order of the defenders under the powers and provisions of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878. The defenders offer payment of a certain amount as compensation for twenty-five of said cows; but refuse compensation in respect of the remaining twenty-one, on the ground that, in their judgment, the pursuer has been guilty, in relation to the said twenty-one cows, of offences against the foresaid Act. I think this determination by the defenders is vi statuti final and conclusive, and one which I cannot review or alter.

"The pursuer contends that the defenders have acted outwith the statute, and with malice and oppression, in reaching the judgment which they have expressed. So far as I can see the defenders' proceedings have been in conformity with the statutory provisions, and there is no relevant averment on record to the contrary. I do not understand how, if acting within their statutory powers, the defenders can be guilty of malice or oppression.

"The parties are not agreed as to the amount of the compensation payable in respect of the twenty-five cows, and I shall allow a proof as regards this part of the case."

for which it was proposed to withhold compensation. The resolution of the Local Authority failed to shew this. The defenders had therefore acted oppressively in rejecting the pursuer's claim, and there had been no honest exercise of the powers given them by the 7th head of the 30th section of the statute. Further, it was necessary for the defenders to shew a connection between the offences charged and the outbreak of the disease, otherwise they could not withhold compensation. This they had not attempted to do, and it was clearly impossible for them to do so, looking to the lapse of time—in some cases eight months—between the offences and the outbreak. On both these grounds, the defenders' resolution could not be held to be in conformity with the provisions of the statute, or to be a bona fide judgment in execution of the powers committed to them, as there were really no sufficient materials before them. It was therefore not excluded from the review of the Court.[1]

Argued for the respondents;—It was admitted that the resolution of the Local Authority was not artistically expressed, and that the minute ought to have borne that the pursuer had been guilty of an offence in regard to each of the cows. But it was clear that they had applied their minds to a consideration of the facts, and that they had properly identified the cows in question as the same as those in respect of which compensation was withheld. Accordingly, they had quite complied with the provisions of the statute, and the objection was at best a technical one, which could be obviated if that was thought right. It was not necessary that there should be any connection established between the offences and the outbreak of the disease; if this had been intended, the Act would not have been silent in regard to it. The widest powers were given to the Local Authority, and their resolution, in the exercise of the discretionary power given to them by the statute, was not subject to review.[2]

At advising, on 12th July 1890,—

Lord President.—I do not think there is any real difficulty about the construction of section 30 of the statute in so far as regards this case. The seventh head is this—"Notwithstanding anything in this Act, the Privy Council or a Local Authority, as the case may be, may, if they think fit, withhold either wholly or partially compensation or other payment in respect of an animal slaughtered under this Act by their respective order where the owner or the person having charge thereof has in their respective judgment been guilty in relation to the animal of an offence against this Act, or where the animal, being a foreign animal, was in their respective judgment diseased at the time of its landing."

Now, the duty and right of the Local Authority under that head of the section seems to be to refuse compensation if in the case of any animal which has been slaughtered under an order of the Authority, they are satisfied that the owner or the person in charge of the animal was guilty of an offence against the Act in relation to that animal, or that the animal being a foreign animal was diseased at the time of its landing, and if they have formed a judgment to that effect. But that of course implies that the Local Authority must take the proper means of satisfying themselves of the matter of fact upon which they proceed. They must inquire and satisfy themselves in the first place that the owner or person in charge of the slaughtered animal has committed some offence against the statute in respect of that animal, or secondly, that the animal being a foreign animal was diseased at the time of its landing. Still, where a collective body like a Local Authority have such a power and have to exercise it after forming a judgment as to the grounds upon which they refuse compensation, I do not see how they can proceed otherwise than by recording in a minute the determination at which they have arrived, and accordingly the Lord Ordinary has proceeded upon that view in the present case, because he finds that in the exercise of their statutory powers the defenders have determined that as regards the twenty-one cows for which they have refused compensation the owner or person in charge has committed some offence against the Act, and that that determination is conclusive.

Now, if that determination had been recorded in a minute I should have agreed with the result at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived. I think that the Local Authority are now quite sensible of the duty devolving upon them, because they have averred in this record that in their judgment "the pursuer was guilty of offences against the statute, or against regulations framed by the defenders under the Animals Act aforesaid, with reference to the twenty-one cows slaughtered by them, for which compensation is now refused." Now if they had embodied that statement in a minute, I think the case would have been quite in shape under the statute, and we could not have listened to any challenge, but unfortunately they have not done so. They have put their minute, dated 5th May 1890, in such a shape that it really does not record this. It says—"The meeting having considered the answers for Mr Calder to the queries put to him by the Local Authority, along with the report of the Bo'ness Committee thereanent, were of opinion that Mr Calder had not adduced any reason to induce the Authority to pay compensation for those animals in regard to which it is alleged that an offence had been committed, and resolved to withhold compensation for the following animals accordingly." Now, that is not a determination on the point at all. Mr Calder was not required to adduce any reasons at all to induce the Local Authority to pay compensation. What the Local Authority required to do, and what they have not done, is to determine according to their own judgment whether such an offence has been committed in point of fact in regard to the animals in question. I do not see that any reason could be stated to induce the Authority to pay compensation if offences had been committed in regard to the animals in question. But they do not find that offences were committed. They find only that Mr Calder has not adduced any reason to induce them to pay compensation for animals which some one alleges have been the subjects of offences. I daresay this is mere looseness of expression or want of attention to the terms of the Act of Parliament, but it is necessary where such large powers are conferred by the Legislature for the Authority to proceed very strictly in accordance with the statute.

While, therefore, I cannot sustain this as an expression of the determination of the Commissioners, which is protected from all challenge, I see that the state of the fact may be that they have formed a judgment although they have not adequately expressed it, and that being so I think it is right that they should still have an opportunity of expressing the judgment at which they have arrived. Therefore, I suggest that we should continue this case to give the defenders an opportunity of shewing that the statement they have made upon record is the finding of the meeting, that they have applied their minds to this question of fact, and have come to a determination. I think that could be done by a minute of a subsequent meeting, an excerpt from which might be lodged in process.

LORD SHAND.—I agree with your Lordship in thinking that if the defenders had in substance by minute stated what is contained in answer 8, the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary ought to have been adhered to. In that answer it is said that in the judgment of the defenders "the pursuer was guilty of offences against the statute or against regulations framed by the defenders, with reference to the twenty-one cows slaughtered by them." That as I understand it means that in the judgment of the defenders the pursuer has been guilty of an offence with reference to each of the twenty-one cows, and these cows have been identified as cows with reference to which an offence has been committed. Your Lordship is of opinion that the minutes do not shew that that judgment has been formed. I confess, although I think the minute is rather loose in its expression, I should not have been indisposed to hold that we have enough here to satisfy the statute, for although there is not a formal minute I rather think there is enough to shew that the Local Authority have formed an opinion that offences were committed in respect of all the animals for which compensation was refused. In the first place, they agreed to pay compensation for certain of the cattle, and "before coming to any determination with reference to those animals in respect to which it is alleged that an offence had been committed," they allow Mr Calder an opportunity of making explanations and representations on certain points, and after receiving his answers they find by a subsequent minute that "Mr Calder had not adduced any reason to induce the Authority to pay compensation for those animals in regard to which it is alleged that an offence had been committed," and they accordingly resolved to withhold compensation. That being so, I would be disposed to read the minute of meeting as sufficient, but it may have a salutary effect to send it back to the Local Authority that they may have an opportunity of putting their determination into a better form.

In regard to the argument which has been submitted, in the first place, I think it is clear that the question of withholding or granting compensation is a matter for the judgment of the Local Authority that cannot be reviewed. I do not say that if they form a judgment without inquiry, or without giving an opportunity to the person whose animals were slaughtered to be heard, that we might not interfere, or that the Local Authority would be protected. But if after making inquiry, and after giving the owner of the animals slaughtered an opportunity to make representations, they then form a judgment that the cattle in regard to which they decline to make compensation are cattle in regard to each of which an offence has been committed, that is, in my opinion, a final decision with regard to which this Court cannot interfere.

The other point which was urged was that the offences alleged with regard to several of these cattle were offences said to have been committed eight, nine, ten, and eleven months before their slaughter took place, and it was said that we must read into this statute something of this kind, that the offence in respect of which compensation was refused must have some relation to the disease which subsequently broke out, and led to the resolution to slaughter, and that it would not do to take a case in which the offence was at such a distance in point of time that it could have no relation to the disease. I am not prepared to take that reading of the statute. It is in very general terms enacted that "where the owner or the person in charge" of the animal has, "in their respective judgment, been guilty in relation to the animal of an offence against the Act," the Authority may, if they see fit, withhold compensation. It is not said that the offence must be within three months or six months or nine months of the slaughter, nor that it must be an offence which has relation to the outbreak of the disease. The clause is in absolutely general terms, and that being so, I do not think that we can add words which would have a limiting effect to it. It may well be that the statute was intended to meet any case of loose practice. At anyrate it is for the Local Authority to judge whether the particular offences, looking to the distance of time between the offence and the outbreak, and the fact that the one bears no relation to the other, are to bar a claim, but I think the matter is one entirely within their discretion. Accordingly, I am of opinion that if they produce a minute which, firstly, clearly and distinctly identifies the cows in regard to which offences have been charged, and, secondly, expresses the decision of the Local Authority that, with reference to these cows, there have been offences committed, the claim for compensation ought to be refused.

LORD M'LAREN.—Without entering on the terms of the clause, I may say that, as I understand the Act of Parliament and the Orders of Council following upon it, their aim is twofold—first, to prevent the spread of contagious diseases among animals, by putting restrictions on the movement of animals from one market to another when the disease is in a latent state; and second, to extirpate it by endeavouring to slaughter all infected animals and those which have come in contact with them. In order to effect the first object herds are placed under quarantine, and any new animals which may be introduced are not allowed to be removed till the lapse of fifty-six days, which is the period of development of the disease, and it is plain that the accomplishment of the object of the Act depends very much on the strict observance of both the requirements which I have mentioned.

Then provision is made for the compensation of the owners of animals which are slaughtered, on the ground doubtless that the slaughter of such animals is for the benefit of the locality, and partly also because it was recognised that there would be an inducement to the owners of infected animals to make the outbreak of the disease known to the Local Authority if they were fairly dealt with. The right to compensation, however, is qualified in an important way. If any owner has not observed the requirements of the first part of the Act, and has been guilty of an offence with regard to the removal of animals, he is not to receive compensation for any animals which have been removed contrary to the Act, or in respect of which an offence has been committed. The statute does not lay on the Local Authority the duty—impossible for it to fulfil—of tracing a connection between the outbreak of the disease and the offence committed, but aims at distributing average justice by proportioning the stoppage of compensation to the degree of negligence. The power of determining whether an offence has been committed rests with the Local Authority, and, in order to guard against any harsh or inconsiderate exercise of discretion, it is provided that no order for stoppage of compensation shall be final till an opportunity has been given to the owner to make an explanation of his conduct. In such cases, therefore, the duty of the Local Authority is, first, to inquire into the facts connected with the alleged contravention of the Act; second, if they have established a prima facie case against the owner, to give him an opportunity to answer it; third, to consider his answer, inquiring certainly into any additional facts alleged to have a bearing on the case; and lastly, to express the determination at which they arrive. Up to the last part of their duty the Local Authority acted with perfect fairness and justice, but they omitted to apply their special finding of facts, and to express their ultimate determination on the whole case. The question then is, whether that omission can be supplied, the Local Authority having acted with substantial justice. The Act does not specify a time within which a determination must be arrived at or the form in which it is to be expressed. Evidently, therefore, if a claim for compensation is made, it may be met by a judgment contrary to it, and this indeed has been recognised in the present case in the lodging of the minutes, which have been a subject of argument, subsequent to the closing of the record.

I agree in thinking that if there has been any omission there is no obstacle to its being remedied, because any time before a proof is allowed on the question of compensation a claim may always be met by a determination of the Local Authority in terms of the Act of Parliament.

I therefore agree that the case should be continued in order to enable the Local Authority to remedy what I consider to be merely a defect in form of their determination.

LORD ADAM was absent.

The Court accordingly continued the cause to allow the defenders an opportunity of remedying the defects of the previous resolution.

The Local Authority held another meeting on 17th October 1890, an excerpt from the minute of which was produced, and is subjoined.*

Parties were again heard, reclaimer's counsel contending that the cattle were not yet sufficiently identified, and that the provision of the statute that the Local Authority was to inquire into and consider the circumstances of the case would be meaningless if it was not intended that some connection should be shewn between the cattle in regard to which "offences" had been committed and the subsequent outbreak.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Lord Ordinary has found that "in exercise of their statutory powers the defenders have determined that as regards the twenty-one

* "The Local Authority having communicated to Mr Calder their minute of 31st January 1890 and considered his written answers thereto; and having at the request of Mr Calder's agent met Mr Calder on 25th April last, and afforded him an opportunity of submitting to it any further representations and explanations that he thought necessary; and having on 3d October current again met with Mr Calder and Mr Alexander Ure, advocate, Edinburgh, his counsel, and heard Mr Ure upon the case; and having subsequently again got access to Mr Calder's byre-book; and having again identified the cattle numbered therein with those enumerated in Mr Kerr's valuation; and having again referred to the various declarations which were formerly before the Local Authority; and having fully considered the representations of Mr Calder, and the whole facts and circumstances of the case; and having fully inquired and informed themselves as to the offences against the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Acts, and against the regulations made by this Local Authority in terms thereof: Find and determine that Mr Calder, or the person in charge on his behalf or by his instructions of the cattle after mentioned, was guilty of an offence or offences against the said Acts and regulations in regard to each of the twenty-one cows slaughtered by them, and numbered 2, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 30, 35, 36, 39, 40, 41, 42, 44, 47, 48, 50, 51, 52, and 54 in Mr Kerr's valuation; and they accordingly resolve to withhold compensation for all the said cows."

cows for which they have refused compensation the pursuers have been guilty of offences against the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878, and that such determination is conclusive." That is in effect to sustain the third plea in law for the defenders, that "the jurisdiction of the Court being excluded by the provisions of the said Act" (i.e., the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878), "the present action is incompetent." I entirely agree in that ground of judgment. I think a large discretion has been committed to the Local Authority, and that their deliverance, if made in terms of the statute, is not subject to review of any kind. In the state of the case as it stood formerly, there certainly was a considerable defect in the deliverance of the Local Authority, which was clearly not in terms of the statute or protected by the statute. Accordingly, we gave them an opportunity of amending their deliverance, and the amended deliverance is now before us.

It is certainly not a sufficient ground for refusing compensation that the owner of cattle is alleged to have committed an offence under the Act. It must be proved to the satisfaction of the Local Authority, and there must in their judgment be a statement that the owner has been guilty of such an offence.

How does the case stand upon the amended deliverance? It appears to me that the defects of the former deliverance are supplied, and it is clearly shewn to my mind that the Local Authority had before them the sort of evidence and the amount of information which is contemplated by the statute. The amended deliverance bears that the Local Authority had their minute of 31st January 1890 and Mr Calder's answers before them, and then proceeds,—"Having at the request of Mr Calder's agent met Mr Calder on 25th April last, and afforded him an opportunity of submitting to it any further representations and explanations that he thought necessary,"—that is quite in accordance with the regulations,—"and having on 3d October current again met with Mr Calder and Mr Alexander Ure, advocate, Edinburgh, his counsel, and heard Mr Ure upon the case; and having subsequently again got access to Mr Calder's byre-book; and having again identified the cattle numbered therein with those enumerated in Mr Kerr's valuation; and having again referred to the various declarations which were formerly before the Local Authority; and having fully considered the representations of Mr Calder, and the whole facts and circumstances of the case; and having fully inquired and informed themselves as to the offences against the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Acts, and against the regulations made by this Local Authority in terms thereof,"—they proceed to find and determine as there set forth.

It is important to observe what according to the minute was the material before the Local Authority in disposing of the matter. They had first of all the explanations by Mr Calder of the charges made against him. They had also his byre-book containing entries in regard to each cow, and as to the date at which it was brought to the byre. Each cow has a particular number and history, and they are enabled thereby to compare with the details in the byre-book the faulty declaration emitted in regard to each case, and in that way they can say which cow has been the subject of offences against the statute. The conclusion at which they arrive is that they "find and determine that Mr Calder, or the person in charge on his behalf or by his instructions of the cattle after mentioned, was guilty of an offence or offences against the said Acts and regulations in regard to each of the twenty-one cows slaughtered by them,"—the number of the cows being then given,—and accordingly they resolve to withhold compensation. That minute is, I think, precisely in terms of the statute, and we cannot get behind it in any way, unless upon allegations of fraud or corruption. There is nothing of that kind on record here.

An attempt was made by Mr Asher so to construe the statute as to shew that the facts of the case as set forth in the deliverance are not within the statute. In the first place, it was contended that the statute contemplated—not expressly but by implication—that the offence disabling a cow or other animal from being a subject for compensation must have some connection with the outbreak of the disease. There is nothing to that effect in the statute, and I have difficulty in seeing how such a provision could be introduced so as to be made workable. How could any Court apply such a provision, or what is to be the extent of the connection between the offence and the disease? I accordingly disregard that argument as founded upon a misreading of the statute. I think the offences contemplated by the statute are just the kind of offences treated by the Local Authority in their last deliverance.

Mr Asher's next argument was that there was not sufficient information of the grounds of decision given in the deliverance. But I do not see that the statute requires that such information should be given. The Local Authority are required to pay compensation, or if they think fit they may withhold it, either wholly or partially, if the animal slaughtered is one in connection with which an offence has been committed. It was said that they were bound to let the pursuer know what offence applied to each individual cow, and not only to communicate this information in the course of their inquiries, but also to embody it in their final deliverance. I do not think that the Local Authority had any such duty. It appears to me that having satisfied themselves upon the evidence, which appears very complete, that an offence had been committed in respect of each of the twenty-one cows, they were entitled to find the owner precluded from claiming compensation. That deliverance is I think final, and cannot now be disputed.

Lord Adam.—The pursuer, Mr Calder, was the proprietor of a number of cows, one of which was seized with pleuro-pneumonia, in the beginning of September 1889. The Local Authority, under the Slaughter Order of 1888, issued by virtue of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Acts, 1878 to 1886, ordered the slaughter of about fifty of the pursuer's cows, which was carried out, and with reference to a portion of these the Local Authority has admitted their liability to pay compensation, but with reference to the remaining twenty-one they have refused it. In so refusing compensation, the Local Authority has proceeded under the powers conferred upon them by the 7th subsection of section 30 of the Act of 1878, and in pursuance of these powers they have thought it fit to withhold it. In the minute of meeting of the Local Authority held on 17th October 1890, they found and declared that "Mr Calder, or the person in charge on his behalf or by his instructions of the cattle after mentioned was guilty of an offence or offences against the said Acts and regulations in regard to each of the twenty-one cows slaughtered by them, . . . and they accordingly resolve to withhold compensation for all the said cows." There can be no doubt whatever that the Local Authority has complied with the terms of the statute, and in the exercise of the discretion which is vested in them they have seen fit to withhold compensation. I think that determination is conclusive, and that no appeal against it can be entertained by us.

Oct. 30, 1890. Calder v. Local Authority of Linlithgow.

It is said, however, that the Local Authority have gone beyond the powers which are vested in them, and this upon the ground that under the statute "the offences or offence against the Act" must have reference to the illness or disease which led to the slaughter of the cattle. This is, it appears to me, a very vague argument. I suppose it amounts to this, that to justify the action of the Local Authority in the present case it must be shewn that the pleuro-pneumonia which led to the slaughter of the cattle is traceable to a prior offence of which the owner or the person in charge of the cattle was guilty. I agree with the opinions of your Lordship in the chair and of Lord Shand and Lord M'Laren when the case was formerly before the Court that the Act is wholly silent as to its being necessary that there shall be any relation between the nature of the offence and the subsequent disease leading to the slaughter of the cattle. The reason may be that, although the disease may have been due to the previous violation of the provisions of the Act which amounted to the offence, still it might not be very easy to prove this. The Act says, that if there are offences against the Act, and if disease breaks out afterwards, the owner must take the responsibility and will not be entitled to get compensation. The determination of the Local Authority is not therefore open to this objection.

But Mr Asher maintained further that he was entitled to get behind the deliverance of the Local Authority, because he has no sufficient information in regard to the offences alleged, and when and how they were committed. There is no provision in the statute that the Local Authority must give any information of that kind, or at all, upon the subject before coming to a determination. But, after a period of eight years, that provision was apparently found to work hardly, and the Privy Council in 1886 issued an order to the effect that a Local Authority, before determining to withhold compensation for animals slaughtered by their order, should give the owner an opportunity of making representations respecting the facts of the case, and should consider them. It is, however, upon the owner that the onus is laid. There is no obligation upon the Local Authority, although in this case they did give a great deal of information, and in his answer the pursuer does not ask for more. What he says is—"That it is not attempted to be shewn that the cows, or any of them, referred to in the statement, are the cows with reference to which the Local Authority are refusing to pay compensation, and the present answers are made without prejudice to Mr Calder's plea that the statements are entirely irrelevant."

I see no reason why the pursuer should be allowed to get behind this deliverance, and I agree with your Lordship that we ought to adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

Lord M'Laren.—I have already had an opportunity of expressing my view of the policy and construction of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act and of the relative Orders of Council, and the proceedings under these enactments in the present case. I have also given my best attention to the arguments of counsel, and they have certainly shewn in my judgment that strict justice has not been done in the way of apportioning the penalties to the offences committed. But I think the answer is that the award of compensation is not a judicial proceeding at all, but that the policy of the Act is to leave the distribution of compensation to a popularly constituted body consisting of persons in the locality, and if they have arrived at a judgment on the matter to hold it conclusive, and I agree that they have arrived at a judgment in this case. If the matter was to be considered judicially the Legislature would not have left its consideration to a body consisting of people out of whose pockets the compensation had to be paid.

It appears to me that the Local Authority have not deviated from the statute, and I am of opinion that the determination of the Local Authority is not subject to review.

The previous section—the 33d—had allowed an appeal to the Circuit Courts or the High Court of Justiciary "in any cause, prosecution or complaint . . . for breach of certificate, or for trafficking in spirits . . . without a certificate . . . on the ground of corruption or malice and oppression on the part of the Sheriff, Justice or Justices of the Peace, or Magistrate, as the case may be, or on such deviations in point of form from the statutory enactments as the Court shall think have prevented substantial justice from having been done, . . ." provided "always that nothing herein contained shall be held to exclude or interfere with the right of appeal to Quarter Sessions which at present exists, . . ." which is conferred by the 14th section of the Home Drummond Act, 1828.

Lundie v. Magistrates of Falkirk.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Kyllachy.
M.

DENIS LUNDIE was tenant and occupier of public-house premises in Kirk Wynd, Falkirk, on a lease for seven years from Whitsunday 1882, and on the expiration of that lease he entered into an agreement for another lease with the proprietors for another period of seven years.

He obtained a transfer of the current certificate of the premises in December 1881, and thereafter his certificate was renewed each year. In April 1889 it was renewed for the year from Whitsunday following, on condition of certain alterations being made upon the premises, which were afterwards executed.

Lundie duly lodged an application for renewal of his certificate before the holding of the Court for granting and renewing certificates on 8th April 1890. He was asked by the magistrates to attend the Court himself, and did so. A report was read to the Court by the superintendent of police, to the effect that the pursuer had been reported in terms of the 14th section of the Public-Houses Acts Amendment Act, 1862, in consequence of drunk persons being seen coming out of his house, and his case was continued till an adjourned Court, which was held nine days afterwards. At this meeting on 17th April, the adjourned application was refused, the provost and two magistrates voting for the refusal, and one magistrate dissenting.

Lundie thereafter brought an action against the provost and magistrates and their clerk, the summons in which concluded for reduction of the deliverance of 17th April 1890, and for declarator that the defenders had failed to perform their duty as magistrates, and that the pursuer was entitled to have decree against them, to the effect of enforcing specific performance of that duty, and that they ought therefore to be ordained to hold a Court to determine the matter raised by the pursuer's application for renewal of his certificate. There was also a conclusion for damages against the provost and two magistrates who had refused the licence.

The pursuer averred, inter alia, that no objections to the renewal of his certificate were lodged, and that he had no intimation of any objection prior to the sitting of the Court on 8th April:—(Cond. 5) "The pursuer, as applicant for a renewal of a certificate in premises 'licensed' or 'certificated' at the time of the application (sec. 8, 25 and 26 Vict. cap. 35, sec. 4, 39 and 40 Vict. cap. 26), was entitled to the protection of the following statutory provisions, which the defenders, the Magistrates of Falkirk, were under the duty and obligation to follow in their last April licensing Court. His application not being for 'a new certificate,' i.e. for premises not certificated at the time of the application, it could not competently be refused without objection laid in the appointed form before the Court, and properly heard and determined. It was not competent to refuse a renewal of his certificate without hearing him in support of the application in 'open Court,' sec. 7, 9 Geo. IV. cap. 58. He did not require to appear in support of his application unless required to attend by the Magistrates (sec. 15, 39 and 40 Vict. cap. 26), and his certificate would without such requisition fall to be renewed as of course. If (as was the case) no objection was lodged under sec. 11 of 25 and 26 Vict. cap. 35, then the only competent objection against the renewal was such as might be made verbally or in writing by any magistrate, or by the procurator-fiscal, chief-constable, or superintendent of police in open Court, in terms of sec. 12 of 25 and 26 Vict. cap. 35. Such objection, if duly stated, was not by itself conclusive, but had to be determined judicially upon evidence and hearing of parties. By sec. 27 of the Act last mentioned the pursuer's application for a renewal of his certificate, with any objection thereto, raised a cause or matter which the defenders, the magistrates, were bound to hear and determine, in observance of the essential forms of judicial procedure prescribed."* (Cond. 6) "At the Court, on 8th April last, the defenders Mr Borthwick Watson, provost, Mr A. C. Rennie, bailie, and Mr Gavin N. Hamilton, bailie, were present. The procurator-fiscal then stated generally that persons had been seen coming out of the pursuer's premises in a state of intoxication, and the provost stated that about two months previously he had seen a man forcibly ejected from the pursuer's premises. Nothing was offered to shew that the pursuer had supplied these persons with drink after they had become intoxicated, nor that they had got any liquor at all in his premises. . . . He had, if he had been heard at the said Court, a sufficient answer to the objection founded on the above-mentioned statements, to the effect that in his anxiety to obey the conditions of his certificate by maintaining good order and rule in his premises, he had properly turned away men who had entered his premises intoxicated, without supplying them with further liquor, and had on one occasion, to which the provost referred, been obliged to expel by force a person who would not go away quietly when refused liquor. The pursuer was refused a hearing at the said Court on 8th April last, and his application was continued, without his answer being allowed to be stated, to an adjourned Licensing Court, to be held on 17th April last. . . . It is explained that section 14 of the Act of 1862† required notice to be given to the pursuer week by week of every case of an intoxicated person being reported by the police as seen leaving his premises, that no such notice was sent to him, and that accordingly the general statement made by the procurator-fiscal of the reports during the whole year was not authorised by the statute, and put the pursuer to an unfair disadvantage in identifying the particular cases referred to." (Cond. 7) "Believing that if the statements by the procurator-fiscal and the provost were to be dealt with as objections to the renewal of his certificate, the same should be heard and determined judicially upon evidence of the whole circumstances, the pursuer applied personally to the provost, on 15th April last, as a magistrate of the burgh competent under section 27 of the Act above mentioned to grant warrant to summon witnesses, to know whether he was to bring witnesses to the adjourned Court, in order to prove that in ejecting persons entering his premises in a state of intoxication he was only doing his duty under the conditions of his certificate. He was informed by the provost that such evidence was not required, and was accordingly led to think that the statements above mentioned were not regarded as objections to the renewal, or putting his licence in danger."

* The 27th section of the Act 25 and 26 Vict. cap. 35, enacted,—"It shall be lawful for any Justice of the Peace or Magistrate in any application for the granting or renewing of a certificate, under the provisions of the recited Acts or of this Act, or in dealing with any objection to such application, or in any other matter arising under the provisions of the recited Acts and this Act, or any of them, to grant warrant to summon witnesses or havers on behalf of any party interested; and it shall be lawful for the Justice or Justices of the Peace, Magistrate or Magistrates, before whom respectively any such application, objection, or matter shall be depending, to examine all such witnesses or havers on oath or solemn affirmation, and to do and perform all things necessary for the due and proper hearing and determination of the cause or matter."

† The 14th section of the Act 25 and 26 Vict. cap. 35, enacted,—"The chief officer of police of every county, district, place, and burgh in Scotland shall, on the first lawful day of every week, transmit or cause to be transmitted to the procurator-fiscal . . . a written report containing the names of all persons licensed to sell excisable liquors by retail from whose premises persons in a state of intoxication have been frequently seen to issue, . . . and such reports shall be brought by such procurator-fiscal under the consideration of the Justices of the Peace and Magistrates of every such county and burgh respectively when assembled to grant and renew certificates, provided always that, within two days after such report shall have been lodged with such procurator-fiscal, notice in writing by post, with postage prepaid, shall be sent by him addressed to each licensed person at his licensed premises of his having been so reported on. . . ."

It was further averred that the provost and magistrates had met privately on the 16th April, and had agreed that the pursuer's adjourned application should be refused. In regard to the proceedings on the 17th, the pursuer stated,—"The hearing on the said day was a mere pretence, the decision against the pursuer having, as now appears, been arranged beforehand. In the absence of evidence, and of any conviction of breach of certificate, the magistrates had no materials for judgment, and they were not entitled to assume that intoxicated persons had been supplied with drink by the pursuer. No proof was offered or given in support of the objection above mentioned, nor was there any trial of the cause. The pursuer was ready, as he intimated to the provost, to bring witnesses in defence. The defender the Provost of Falkirk, nevertheless, in utter disregard of the statutes and of all fair judicial procedure, and in pursuance of the secret agreement made on the previous day, as above mentioned, refused all opportunity for inquiry, and announced the deliverance or judgment of himself and the defenders Bailies Rennie and Hamilton, then present, to be, in respect of the unproved objections above mentioned, that the pursuer's application for a certificate should be refused."

There was a further averment to the effect that the provost was disqualified under the 13th section of the Act of Geo. IV. cap. 58, and at common law, from judging in the pursuer's application, as he was vested qua trustee under a trust-deed in certain public-house premises in the burgh, and thus "not only became himself a dealer in excisable liquors, but had a distinct interest to effect a favourable sale at an enhanced price by shutting up pursuer's public-house."

It was stated for the defenders that the pursuer had appealed against the decision of the magistrates to the Quarter Sessions, but that the appeal had been unanimously dismissed.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The refusal of the pursuer's application should be reduced or declared of no effect, in respect the proceedings complained of were outwith the statutes and unlawful, and the provost was disqualified. (2) The pursuer having duly made his statutory application for renewal, and the same not having been duly and properly disposed of within the statutory period for holding licensing Courts, the same should now be held as granted, and the clerk be ordained to issue a renewed certificate. (3) The pursuer is otherwise entitled to redress by having the defenders ordained to hold a Court, and to perform towards him the public duty of duly and properly hearing and determining his cause.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The action is incompetent. (2) In respect of the appeal taken by the pursuer to the Quarter Sessions, and of the unchallenged judgment of that Court, the present action is excluded. (3) The pursuer's averments are irrelevant, and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons.

The Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy), on 19th July 1890, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Allows the parties a proof of their respective averments with respect to the objections stated in the licensing Court against the renewal of the pursuer's certificate, founded on the alleged fact that the pursuer had been reported on during the year, in terms of the 14th section of the Act 25 and 26 Vict. cap. 35, in consequence of drunken persons having been seen to issue from the public-house, and with respect to the manner in which the said objections were dealt with by the magistrates," &c.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The Lord Ordinary had restricted the allowance of proof to the averments made by the pursuer in the 6th article of his condescendence. But these were as irrelevant as the rest of the case. Under section 11 of the Public-Houses Acts Amendment Act, 1862, anyone in the neighbourhood of the house which was to be licensed who objected to the granting of a licence had to give notice five days before the holding of the Court. But by the 12th section the requirement of notice did not apply to objections by the procurator-fiscal or the provost, such as had been made here. The magistrates had an absolute discretion, and were entitled to consider all objections and to proceed, according to their discretion, on matters not made the subject of judicial inquiry. The Lord Ordinary had had a difficulty as to whether the want of the notices required by the 14th section of the Act of 1862 to be made to the licensed person where people had been seen to leave his premises in a state of intoxication was not relevant to go to proof. But the answer was that if the pursuer had suffered from that want of notice he had his remedy before the Quarter Sessions, to which a right of appeal was given under the 14th section of the Home Drummond Act, 1828,[1] and he might have led proof before them. It had been held that the magistrates in the licensing Courts had an absolute discretion vested in them in regard to renewals,[2] and there was no appeal except to Quarter Sessions. The reduction was therefore incompetent, and even the limited allowance of proof granted by the Lord Ordinary should be refused.

Argued for the respondent;—The magistrates were bound to try cases in the licensing Courts judicially, and in substance and reality. This case upon the averments was one of abuse. The magistrates had decided to refuse the renewal of the certificate in private before they met in public, and had failed to perform their statutory duty. The present action was competent, there being a conclusion asking that they should be ordained to re-hear the case. It was a procedure analogous to that provided by the 91st section of the Court of Session Act, 1868, where the Court were empowered to order the performance of any statutory duty upon a petition asking them to do so. The magistrates had failed to comply with the provisions of the licensing Courts, as set forth on record, just as in a previous case under the same Acts they had exceeded their statutory powers, with the result that the Court of Session gave redress.[3] The magistrates had acted here as an arbiter sometimes did, where he refused to hear the parties. It had been decided in England that an old licence could not be taken away or a renewal refused except for fault. At least this was so until the recent case of Sharpe, in which admittedly the Court of Appeal had held that the Justices had absolute discretion even in the case of a renewal.[1] But the decision in that case was now under appeal to the House of Lords. No doubt there had been an appeal to Quarter Sessions in this case. But they had no power to hear evidence; the only power they had was to receive de novo the evidence which had been led before the Justices, where no record of it had been kept.[2] Further, the provost had failed to comply with the provisions of the 27th section of the Act of 1862 in refusing to grant the pursuer a warrant to cite witnesses when asked to do so. He was also himself disqualified from sitting as a licensing magistrate in the circumstances alleged.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I have listened with great attention to the remarks of Mr Vary Campbell, and I feel the full force of his argument as regards the justice of the case, but he has failed to satisfy me that there is anything on record which can be made the subject of inquiry in this Court, and therein I am constrained to differ from the Lord Ordinary.

The subject-matter of the jurisdiction committed to the Justices in regard to the granting of licences under the Public-Houses Acts was never a proper part of the civil jurisdiction of this country; it was never a part of the work of the civil Courts, and it was from the beginning committed to a special tribunal, which the Legislature thought better fitted for the disposal of such questions than the civil Courts. In that respect I think the Legislature has acted very wisely, because the question arising for decision in each case is one of expediency—it is not a question of law or a pure question of fact. It is rather this, whether it is most expedient in the interests of a burgh or of a county that a licence should be granted, and, accordingly, it is not surprising that an appeal from the special tribunal to any Court of civil jurisdiction should be altogether prohibited.

The Court of Quarter Sessions is not in a different position, because it is, in a sense, the same kind of tribunal as the original Court of licensing Justices. It is composed of the same class of men, endowed with the same qualifications, and, accordingly, an appeal to Quarter Sessions is very natural in the circumstances.

But the statutes make it plain that the only appeal is to Quarter Sessions. When an appeal is given to a particular tribunal, that would in ordinary circumstances impliedly exclude any other appeal; but in the present case the statutes do not leave the matter there, for they provide not only that there shall be an appeal to Quarter Sessions, but by the 34th section of the Act 25 and 26 Vict. cap. 35, it is further provided, that "no warrant, sentence, order, decree, judgment, or decision made or given by any Quarter Sessions, Sheriff, Justice or Justices of the Peace, or Magistrate" in any matter under the authority of these Acts shall be subject to reduction, or appeal, or any other form of review, "on any ground or for any reason whatever, other than by this Act provided," thereby referring to the provisions of the preceding section dealing with appeals in cases of breach of certificate.

I cannot comprehend upon what ground we are asked to entertain this reduction. The true nature of the action is not disguised. We are asked to reduce the proceedings of the Justices upon their merits—perhaps not in this sense, that the pursuer of the reduction takes up the position that the Court came to a wrong conclusion upon the evidence before it. It may be that the ground of objection is that the defenders did not take the proper evidence to enable them to decide the question before them, or that they excluded evidence which ought to have been admitted, or allowed evidence which ought to have been excluded. But all these things are within the jurisdiction of the Court to whom is committed a privity of jurisdiction under the statutes, and we have nothing to do with the way in which that Court conducts its inquiry, or with the propriety of its proceedings, any more than we have with the general result at which it may arrive. In short, we are not entitled to touch a judgment of the Justices or of the Quarter Sessions, unless it can be shewn that these tribunals, or either of them, have exceeded their statutory jurisdiction, and I cannot find any relevant averment in the present case that they have done so.

The present is a different case from that of Ashley v. The Magistrates of Rothesay. In that case the magistrates, while professing to act under the Public-Houses Acts, put their powers to a use never intended by the Legislature, and which was most inexpedient and undesirable. The magistrates were empowered, in terms of the provisions of the Forbes Mackenzie Act, 1853, and the Act of 25 and 26 Vict. cap. 35, to order that, "in any particular locality" within the burgh "requiring other hours for opening and closing," the public-houses should be closed at ten rather than at eleven o'clock. What they did was to provide that the whole of the public-houses within the burgh should be closed at ten o'clock. Not that they made a provision to this effect in so many words. They acted in a more ingenious way, but it appeared that "the particular locality" or district within which they provided that their resolution should apply included the whole burgh of Rothesay, with all the inns and public-houses it contained. That was very plainly in excess of the powers of the magistrates, and amounted to a perversion of the statute to a purpose to which it was not intended to apply.

The only question in the present case is whether it is proper that the pursuer should have his licence renewed. Upon that question the magistrates of the burgh have given judgment, and an appeal was then taken against that judgment to the Court of Quarter Sessions, who affirmed it, and unless we are to go outside of the statute, which excludes our jurisdiction, I do not see how it is possible to get the better of it.

One question was raised, which, at first sight, may create an appearance of a ground of challenge. It is said that the provost was disqualified from sitting on the bench of Justices by the terms of the 13th section of the Home Drummond Act, 1828. That section provides "that no Justice of the Peace or Magistrate in any county or royal burgh, who is a brewer, maltster, distiller, or dealer in or retailer of ale, beer, spirits, wine, or other exciseable liquors, or who shall be in partnership with any person as a brewer, maltster, distiller, or dealer in or retailer of ale, beer, spirits, wine, or other exciseable liquors, shall act as such Justice of the Peace or Magistrate respectively in the execution of this Act." That is the first part of the clause; and then it proceeds,—"Nor shall any Justice of the Peace or Magistrate act in the granting of any certificate when he shall be the proprietor or tenant of the house or premises for which such certificate shall be applied for; and everything done by a Justice of the Peace or Magistrate respectively in any case in which he is so disqualified to act shall be null and void." The only allegation made against the provost in the present case is that he is trustee on the sequestrated estate, part of which consisted of a public-house business. The trustee did not hold the licence himself, and he was not a retailer, nor was he a dealer in exciseable liquors. Further, he was neither a proprietor nor tenant of the house in regard to which the application for a licence was made. Accordingly that section does not affect the case. No. 12.

Oct. 31, 1890. Lundie v. Magistrates of Falkirk.

Putting aside that objection, I cannot see any other ground upon which the Lord Ordinary should have allowed inquiry, and I am therefore of opinion that his Lordship's interlocutor should be recalled, and the action dismissed.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT accordingly recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, sustained the defences, and assoilzied the defenders.

They were subsequently compelled, in order to dispose of the sewage, to undertake the construction of a system of sewage purification and disposal works, and in order to get compulsory powers to acquire the land for this purpose they had, as the Local Authority, to obtain a Provisional Order and a Provisional Order Confirmation Act, in terms of the Public Health Act, 1867. The cost of obtaining the Act and of purchasing the ground and constructing the works was about £19,000.

The Commissioners having proposed to raise both sums by assessments on owners under the Police Act of 1862,* certain owners contended that the latter sum should be raised, under the Public Health Act, by an assessment upon occupiers.

Sec. 97,—"The Commissioners shall, if necessary, impose a sewer rate, to be called, for the purposes of this Act, the 'general sewer rate,' distinct from any other rate which they are authorised to make under this Act, to be applied in maintaining and clearing the sewers, and all other expenses connected with such sewers not herein otherwise provided for, or which may not be fully defrayed by the special sewer rate, and for securing and paying off any monies which may be borrowed on the security of the special sewer rate under the provisions of this Act, and the interest of such monies which the special sewer rate shall be insufficient to defray." Sec. 98,—"The Commissioners may from time to time make assessments in respect of the said special sewer rate and general sewer rate hereby authorised to be levied on the owners of all lands or premises within the burgh, or within separate and distinct districts, and that in reference to the valuation of such lands or premises as fixed by the Valuation-roll. . . . that Act,* there being a police (but no prison) assessment in the burgh, which was so leviable under sec. 84 of the Police Act of 1862.

In 1870 the Burgh of Kirkintilloch adopted the General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862, and the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867, having been in force in the burgh before that date, the Police Commissioners thereupon became the Local Authority under that Act.

Thereafter the Police Commissioners proceeded to provide a complete system of public sewers throughout the burgh under the General Police Act of 1862. Subsequently, in consequence of lower proprietors complaining of the pollution of streams, a system of sewage purification and disposal works had to be undertaken, which involved the purchase of land and wayleave rights under "The Kirkintilloch Provisional Order Confirmation Act," obtained in 1884. The total cost of procuring the Act, of purchasing the land, and constructing the works, was £19,575, and of making the sewers under the General Police Act was £4070, in all £23,645.†

The Police Commissioners had been in use to assess only owners of property for sewage purposes in terms of the General Police Act, 1862, secs. 96-100. But an objection having been made that the assessment ought to be levied not upon owners but upon occupiers only, or at least partly, in terms of the Public Health Act, 1867, a special case was presented to the Court by (1) the Police Commissioners, (2) certain owners, and (3) an occupier in the burgh, in which the following questions were put:—"(1) Ought the said assessment to be imposed only upon the owners of heritable

(3) In the event of the two first questions being answered in the negative, ought the assessment, in so far as it is necessary to provide for the cost of procuring the said Provisional Order and Confirmation Act, and of purchasing the land and wayleave rights and constructing the purification works above mentioned, to be levied upon the occupiers of heritable property within the burgh?"

It was stated in the case,—"The provisions as to assessments for sewers under the General Police Act of 1862 are contained in clauses 96 to 100 thereof inclusive. Under that Act the said assessments fall to be paid by the owners of heritable property. No assessment whatever, either for construction or maintenance of sewers, is leviable under said Act upon the occupiers of heritable property.

"Under the Public Health Act of 1867 the assessments for drainage or sewage purposes are leviable under clauses 93 and 94 thereof.

"In the burgh of Kirkintilloch there is no prison assessment leviable. Kirkintilloch is not a burgh as defined by sec. 4 of the Prisons (Scotland) Administration Act, 23 and 24 Vict. cap. 105, but fell to be, and was in fact, assessed by the Commissioners of Supply as a landward part of the county of Dumbarton, and the prison assessment was levied upon proprietors from the passing of said Act, until the passing of the Prisons Act, 1877. Under section 84 of the General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862, which is referred to for its terms, the first parties assess all occupiers of lands or premises within the burgh in the sums necessary to be levied for the 'police purposes' of that Act. By that section it is provided that the assessment just mentioned shall, for the purposes of that Act, be called the 'police assessment.' The burgh of Kirkintilloch is a special police district of the county of Dumbarton, under the County Police Act, 20 and 21 Vict. c. 72, and by virtue of that Act there is a police assessment leviable by the Commissioners of Supply within the burgh upon owners of property.

"The first parties have hitherto assessed only owners of property for sewage purposes, in terms of the General Police and Improvement Act, 1862. They have imposed and levied, or are about to levy, a similar assessment for the year 1889-90, and propose to do so annually in future, until the whole sum of £23,645 is defrayed. The second parties now object to this, and maintain that said assessment should be levied on occupiers only, under and in terms of the Public Health Act of 1867. In any event the second parties maintain that the cost of obtaining the said Provisional Order and Confirmation Act, and of purchasing land and wayleave rights, and constructing the purification works, and laying intercepting and out-fall sewers, as above mentioned, is leviable on occupiers only, in terms of the Public Health Act, 1867. The third parties maintain that the course adopted by the first parties is correct."

At the hearing the second parties conceded that the £4070—the cost of making the sewers originally—was rightly imposed upon owners. Their argument in regard to the £19,575 sufficiently appears from the judgment of the Court.

Argued for the first and third parties;—The purification works were a necessary adjunct of the sewerage operations under the 96th section of the Act of 1862, for which owners only were liable, and if the Commissioners had been able to obtain the land by private bargain no question could have been raised. It was admitted that it was the Public Health Act, 1867, alone which gave the power to take land, but the fact that it had been necessary to get power to acquire land was not enough to alter the incidence of the taxation, which otherwise would have fallen under the Police Act of 1862 upon owners. As stated in the case, there were two senses in which the words "police assessment" used in the 94th section of the Public Health Act, 1867, could be interpreted in regard to the burgh of Kirkintilloch. If they were held to apply to the assessment levied by the Commissioners of Supply (now the County Council) which was strictly the assessment for maintenance of the police force, then as the Commissioners of Police levied neither a prison nor a police assessment, the new rate would fall to be levied in the same way as the poor-rate, i.e., half on owners and half on occupiers.

LORD ADAM.—The parties to this case are, first, the Commissioners of Police of the burgh of Kirkintilloch, under the Police and Improvement Act of 1862, and as such the Local Authority of the burgh under the Public Health Act of 1867; second, certain owners of heritable property within the burgh; and third, certain occupiers of heritable property within the burgh.

We find from the case that the burgh of Kirkintilloch adopted the Police Act of 1862 in 1870, and elected Commissioners of Police under that Act, who, under the Public Health Act of 1867, became the Local Authority of the burgh. When these two Acts came into operation in Kirkintilloch there was no system of public sewers in the burgh, and the Police Commissioners had to provide such a system, and did so at a cost of £4070, the whole proceedings being taken under the Act of 1862. To discharge the expense of these operations the Police Commissioners levied an annual assessment upon the owners of heritable property within the burgh under the Act of 1862.

In consequence of legal proceedings instituted by certain riparian proprietors who complained of the pollution of streams passing through their lands by the outflow of these public sewers the Police Commissioners of the burgh were compelled to undertake the construction of a system of sewage purification and disposal works. To enable them to acquire the land necessary for that purpose, they had to apply for a Provisional Order Confirmation Act under the Act of 1867, which they accordingly did. The land was acquired and the works constructed, and the cost of the scheme to date, including the cost of constructing the original sewers, is £23,645.

The details of that expense are set forth in the case under seven heads, the seventh item being the cost of former public sewers, £4070. I may dispose of this last item at once, as it is not now matter of dispute that the Commissioners of the burgh, in order to defray that expense, rightly imposed an assessment upon the owners of heritable property within the burgh. After deducting that item there are still six items of expenditure left, amounting to the sum of £19,575, and the real question we have to decide is whether the assessment necessary to meet that charge is to be laid on owners or occupiers of heritable property within the burgh.

Before proceeding, however, to a consideration of that question, I may say that all the six items I have mentioned have been occasioned by the sewage purification and disposal works, and that it is, in my opinion, impossible to separate one of these items from the other, as not being part of the same scheme, and that they must all, as regards the question of assessment, be dealt with together.

The next point to be kept in view is that these works were constructed by the Commissioners of Police and the Local Authority under the powers given by the Public Health Act of 1867. In the Provisional Order Confirmation Act there are set forth by way of preamble the clauses of the Act of 1867, under which the Commissioners applied for powers, and having got these powers they executed the works, with the result that they expended the sum already stated. The works accordingly were all executed under the Act of 1867, and the only question we have to decide is, whether under the assessing powers of the Act of 1867 the expense is properly constituted a burden on the owners, or on the occupiers of heritable property within the burgh.

The assessing clause of the Act of 1867 is the 94th, which enacts that "With respect to burghs having a population of less than ten thousand according to the census last taken, and not having a local Act for police purposes," and Kirkintilloch falls in that category "... (2) All charges and expenses incurred by the Local Authority in executing this Act or any of the Acts hereby repealed, and not recovered as herein before or after provided, may be defrayed out of an assessment to be levied by the Local Authority along with but as a separate assessment from any one of the assessments hereinafter mentioned in this section; that is to say, the said assessments shall be assessed, levied, and recovered in like manner, and under like powers (which powers are hereby given and are declared to extend over the whole and every part of the district of the Local Authority) as the prison assessment or police assessment, as the Local Authority shall resolve, where the Local Authority is a town-council or Police Commissioners, or trustees acting as Police Commissioners; or, if there be no prison or police assessment, an assessment levied in like manner as is hereinafter authorised, where the Local Authority is a parochial board." Now this assessment is to be levied "in like manner" as the prison assessment or the police assessment, as the Local Authority shall resolve, and the Commissioners of Police are the Local Authority in this case. Therefore, if there is both a prison assessment and a police assessment, they can choose either one or other along with which to levy this assessment. If there is no prison assessment they must levy it along with the police assessment, and vice versa; and if there is neither a prison nor a police assessment, another alternative is open to them, with which we are not here concerned.

The question then comes to be whether there is in the burgh of Kirkintilloch a prison assessment, or a police assessment, or both a prison and a police assessment, which the Commissioners of Police are in use to levy, and in the case we are told that there is no prison assessment leviable in the burgh, the reason being that as regards that assessment Kirkintilloch is assessed as part of the county by the Commissioners of Supply. With regard, however, to the police assessment we are told that "under section 84 of the General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862, the first parties assess all occupiers of lands or premises within the burgh in the sums necessary to be levied for the 'police purposes' of that Act. By that section it is provided that the assessment just mentioned shall, for the purposes of that Act, be called the 'police assessment,'" and by referring to the section we see that that is so. It is accordingly matter of admission that there is no prison assessment leviable in the burgh, but that there is a police assessment levied upon occupiers. The particular assessment with which we are dealing is therefore to be levied in the like manner, and along with the police assessment—which means, on the same parties as are subject to that assessment, and that being so there is an end of the case.

I think the statute is clear, and that the expenditure of £19,575 must be met by assessments laid on occupiers and not on owners.

LORD M'LAREN and the LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

THE COURT found and declared that the assessment so far as it was necessary to defray the amount of £4070 mentioned in the case was to be imposed upon the owners of heritable property within the burgh, and that the assessment so far as it was necessary to defray the amount of £19,575 was to be imposed upon the occupiers of heritable property within the burgh.

JOHN R. WILSON, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—Shaw.

Reparation—Slander—Innuendo—Privilege—Issue.—In an action of damages for slander the pursuer averred that he had let a cutting machine on hire to W., and that on W. becoming insolvent, and granting a trust-deed, he (the pursuer) had removed the machine from his premises; that the defender, the trustee's agent, wrote to the pursuer a letter, stating,—"I have been instructed by the trustee, who has already written you twice on the subject, to apply to you for evidence of your right to remove from W.'s premises a cutting machine, which you removed without his permission. Unless I have this evidence, or delivery of the machine, by Tuesday morning, I shall place the matter in the hands of the fiscal without further notice"; that the statements in the letter were false and calumnious, and falsely and calumniously implied, and were intended by the defender to imply and represent, that shortly before the date of the letter the pursuer was guilty of the crime of theft by having stolen a cutting machine from the premises of W.; that the said letter was written and sent, and the said charge of theft made by the defender against the pursuer, maliciously, without instructions from his client, the trustee, and although he well knew there were no grounds for it, for the purpose of concussing the pursuer into an abandonment of his right to the machine, and in order to gratify the feeling of ill-will. Held (1) (following Mackay v. M'Cankie, 10 R. 537) that the letter would bear the innuendo, and that the pursuer was entitled to an issue; and (2) (dub. Lord Kinnear) that the word "maliciously" should not be put in the issue.

Opinions (per the Lord President and Lord Adam) that if it were proved that the defender made the charge of theft without instructions from his client, he was not privileged.

Opinion (per Lord Kinnear) that if the defender had instructions from his client to write a letter to the pursuer demanding delivery of the machine, the mere variation in its terms from his instructions would not deprive him of his privilege.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Kinnear. C.

IN March 1890 John R. Wilson, wholesale manufacturer of tradesmen's fittings and machines in Edinburgh, raised an action of damages for slander against J. Watson Purvis, solicitor, Glasgow.

The pursuer averred;—(Cond. 2) "In June 1889 the pursuer let a cutting machine on hire to William Wright, baker, Stranraer, but as the latter became insolvent, and unable to pay the hire, the pursuer removed the said machine, which was his property, from Wright's premises, and resumed the possession of it, as he was entitled to do by the terms of his contract. Prior to the removal Wright had called a meeting of his creditors, at which a state of affairs, prepared by W. Greig Steel, accountant in Glasgow, trustee under a voluntary trust-deed for behoof of creditors granted by Wright in his favour, was submitted. Wright had explained to Steel that he held the machine on hire from the pursuer, and said machine was not included in said state of affairs as the property of Wright. The pursuer also at said meeting explained to Steel that the said machine had been hired to Wright, and Steel was satisfied with the explanation, and was quite willing that said machine should be removed by the pursuer. These facts were well known to the defender, Purvis, who acted as the agent in the trust."

(Cond. 3) "The defender, Purvis, on 1st March 1890, wrote the following letter to Wilson:—'Wright's Trust.—Dear Sir,—I have been instructed by the trustee in the above, who has already written you twice on the subject, to apply to you for evidence of your right to remove from Wright's premises a cutting machine, which you removed without his permission. Unless I have this evidence, or delivery of the machine, by Tuesday morning, I shall place the matter in the hands of the fiscal without further notice.—Yours truly, J. WATSON PURVIS.'"

(Cond. 4) "Said letter was sent to, and was received by, the pursuer on or about the date it bears. It is of and concerning the pursuer. The statements in said letter are false and calumnious, and falsely and calumniously imply, and were intended by the defender, Purvis, to imply and represent, that shortly before the date of the said letter the pursuer was guilty of the crime of theft, by having stolen a cutting machine from the premises of the said William Wright."

(Cond. 5) "Said letter was written and sent, and said charge of theft was made by the defender, Purvis, against the pursuer maliciously, without instructions from his said client, and although he well knew there were no grounds for it, for the improper and malicious purpose of concussing the pursuer into an abandonment of his right of property in said machine, and in order to gratify a feeling of ill-will against the pursuer, and to injure him in his business."

The defender, in his answers, stated that Mr Steel, the trustee, had written to the pursuer, on 19th February 1890, in these terms:—"I understand that you removed from Mr Wright's premises in Stranraer a cutting machine which you had sold to him on time payment. Kindly let me have copy of your agreement, as I can find no trace of the transaction amongst Mr Wright's papers.—Yours truly, W. GREIG STEEL, Trustee." No reply having been received, Steel wrote again to Wilson, on 26th February, that action would at once be taken if no satisfactory reply were given, and the matter put in the hands of the law-agent to the trust. No reply was made to these letters, and the cutting machine was not returned by pursuer. Steel thereupon wrote to the defender, Purvis, the following letter:—"1st March 1890.—Wm. Wright's Estate.—Dear Sir,—At foot you will find copy of two letters which I have written to a Mr Wilson, 38 Lady Lawson St., in Edinbro', but to which I have received no reply. Kindly take the matter in hand, and insist upon delivery of the machine in question failing required proof, and charge Wilson with your expenses."

In answer to cond. 3 the defender stated;—"The instructions by the defender Steel to this defender were contained in the letter dated 1st March 1890, which is referred to."

The defender pleaded;—(2) The action is irrelevant. (3) The statements complained of not being slanderous, defender should be assoilzied, with expenses. (4) The statements made by the defender in the said letter are privileged.

The following issue was adjusted by the Lord Ordinary (Kinnear) for the trial of the cause:—"It being admitted that a letter, in the terms contained in the schedule hereto annexed" (i.e., the letter above quoted), "was written and sent by the defender to the pursuer—Whether said letter is of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely, calumniously, and maliciously represents that he was guilty of the crime of theft by having stolen a cutting machine from the premises of William Wright, baker, Stranraer, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer? Damages laid at £1000."

The pursuer then moved the First Division to have the issue varied by the deletion of the words "and maliciously," and by inserting the word "and" between the words "falsely" and "calumniously."

He argued;—(1) The letter bore the innuendo set forth in the issue. The case of Mackay was conclusive upon that point.[1] (2) There was no case of privilege, and therefore the word "maliciously" ought to be struck out of the issue. It might have been different if Steel had authorised the letter, but all he intended was that civil proceedings should be taken to recover the machine. If the defender had given information to the fiscal there might then have been a case of privilege, and it might further turn out at the trial that there were communications between Steel and the defender other than what appeared upon record which would amount to privilege. But no privilege attached to the defender simply from his position as agent.

Argued for the respondent;—(1) The letter did not bear the construction put upon it. (2) A communication to the procurator-fiscal was privileged, and malice and probable cause ought therefore to be put into the issue,[2] for although the procurator-fiscal was not approached here, there was no reason to doubt that it was the bona fide intention of the defender to report the matter to him.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a very small and a very narrow case, in my view. It appeared to me at first sight that it was very doubtful whether there was any issuable matter to send to trial. But I think the case of Mackay v. M'Cankie is a sufficient precedent for granting an issue, and therefore the only question is as to the form of issue, whether the word "maliciously" is to be inserted, as well as "falsely and calumniously," or whether it is to be omitted. The answer to the question depends, I think, a good deal upon the state of the record, and we are informed there that the defender, Mr Purvis, was agent for the trustee upon a bankrupt estate. He received letters of instruction from the trustee with regard to the recovery of a cutting machine which was said to belong to the bankrupt, and he carried out these instructions by writing the letter complained of. There cannot be a doubt that the letter goes beyond the instructions, and accordingly prima facie, and as the case stands upon record, the defender does not seem to be at all in a position of privilege. He wrote at his own hand, and without instructions, a letter which the pursuer has innuendoed, and we must assume properly innuendoed, to mean that the letter contains an imputation of theft, and that it was intended to lay the matter in question before the procurator-fiscal.

I am of opinion that the word "maliciously" ought not to be inserted in the issue, but I think it is necessary to add that the facts may possibly give the case a different complexion, and that it may turn out that there are grounds for the defence of privilege. If it should so turn out, it is, I think, quite in the power of the presiding Judge, as malice is averred upon record, to intimate to the jury that they cannot return a verdict for the pursuer, unless malice on the defender's part be proved. That is not, however, sufficient to justify the insertion of the word "maliciously" in the issue.

To the extent I have explained, I differ from the Lord Ordinary as to the form of the issue to be allowed.

LORD ADAM.—I think the case of Mackay is an authority for granting an issue in this case. The facts of the two cases are very similar.

As to the form of issue, my opinion is that the matter of privilege should be disposed of at the trial. The defender was an agent employed by Mr Steel to vindicate the right of a bankrupt estate, on which he was trustee, to a cutting machine, and to recover it from the present pursuer. The matter was one purely of civil right, and the instructions which the defender got were merely to insist upon delivery of the machine. Instead of that, the defender wrote a letter which the pursuer avers and offers to prove accuses him of theft. If the pursuer succeeds in proving the innuendo he has placed upon the letter, I am not at present disposed to think that there was any privilege. At the same time, the defender may be able to shew at the trial that he was privileged, and if so, it will be for the presiding Judge to direct the jury that malice must in that event be also proved to their satisfaction, before a verdict for the pursuer can be returned.

LORD M'LAREN.—Any experience I have had regarding this class of cases inclines me to the view that it is impossible to lay down absolute rules defining the right of a pursuer of an action of damages for slander to have a case presented to a jury where the words used are not actionable in themselves. The Court has in more than one recent case assoilzied from actions of constructive slander where the words used did not on a reasonable construction infer a right to reparation. I wish to guard myself against being supposed to hold that every one who gives notice to the procurator-fiscal with a view to a prosecution gives ground for an action of damages. It may very well be that in giving notice he is doing what is only fair and just. If he is only prevented from following up the notice by receiving satisfactory explanations or because something has occurred to satisfy him he was mistaken, I should not hold that he had laid himself open to an action for libel. But again, there may be cases where the threat of a criminal prosecution has been used for the purpose of inducing the person against whom it was directed to give way to a demand. It would be proper to send the latter class of case to a jury.

I do not think that any prima facie case of privilege is raised upon record. That would only arise if the notice had been followed up by a representation to the procurator-fiscal. I can quite understand the Lord Ordinary's view that this was the initial step of an information to be lodged with the criminal authorities, but I am not satisfied that it was an initial step, or that there was any intention of proceeding further. It will be for the Judge at the trial to determine whether a case of privilege has been proved, and to direct the jury accordingly.

LORD KINNEAR.—If your Lordships are all of opinion that the question whether the pursuer can get a verdict in this case without satisfying the jury that the letter he complains of was written maliciously should be left to the presiding Judge at the trial, then I do not dissent from your Lordships' view that the word "maliciously" should be struck out of the issue. But I could not concur in the judgment if it implied that the pursuer would be entitled to a verdict although malice had not been proved. I cannot assent to the view which was expressed by one of your Lordships that there can be no privilege because of a variation between the written instructions given to the defender by his client and the terms of the letter he wrote in carrying them out. That may or may not be evidence tending to prove malice. But it appears to me to have no bearing on the question whether it is necessary that malice should be proved.

THE COURT varied the issue in terms of the pursuer's motion.

WILLIAM GRAY, Pursuer.—Guthrie Smith—Watt.
NORTH BRITISH RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders.—Comrie Thomson—F. T. Cooper.

Reparation—Precautions for the safety of the public—Railway—Escape of dog entrusted for carriage.—In an action of damages against a railway company by a man who had been bitten by a dog which had escaped from the custody of the company, the following facts were proved:—The dog, with a collar and chain attached, was delivered to the railway company at Kelso for carriage to Perth, the guard being told that it was a quiet animal. At Waverley Station, Edinburgh, where it had an hour and a-half to wait in the parcel-office during change of train, it seemed to get excited, and snapped at its chain. On being led out to rejoin the train it at first went quietly, but soon shewed a disposition to bite, and finally broke away from the porter who was leading it, and escaped from the station. It found its way to a public garden at some distance, where it was secured by the pursuer and two other gardeners, and left in the charge of the pursuer, when it bit him. The jury returned a verdict for the pursuer. The Court granted a new trial, on the ground that there was no evidence of fault on the part of the railway company in permitting the dog to escape.

Opinions that the injury complained of was too remote to infer liability on the part of the company even if they had been responsible for the escape of the dog.

1ST DIVISION. C.

ON 31st August 1889 a collie dog was delivered to the North British Railway Company for conveyance from Kelso to Perth. While in transit, at the Waverley Station, Edinburgh, from the Kelso to the Perth platform, it escaped out of the station, and found its way through the town to the Botanic Gardens, more than a mile from the station. It then bit a gardener named Gray, who was endeavouring to take it out of the Gardens. Gray brought an action for damages against the company.

He averred that the dog was a vicious dog; that the company's servants when it was delivered to them were so told; that they nevertheless failed to take the proper precautions to prevent it from escaping while in their custody; and therefore that its escape and his injury were due to their fault.

The defenders pleaded;—(2) The pursuer, not having received the injuries of which he complains owing to the fault of the defenders, they are entitled to absolvitor. (3) The pursuer having received the injuries of which he complains owing to his having approached the said dog, though it was obviously dangerous to do so, the defenders should be assoilzied.

The case was tried before Lord Trayner and a jury at the Summer Sittings, 1890, upon the following issue:—"Whether on or about 31st August 1889, and in or near the Royal Botanic Gardens, Edinburgh, the pursuer was bitten by a dog which had been placed in the defenders' custody for transit from Kelso to Perth or elsewhere, through the fault of the defenders, to his loss, injury, and damage. Damages laid at £250."

The following was the import of the evidence led at the trial:—The owner of the dog deponed that he had never seen any sign of vice about it, and that it was quiet and in its usual state at the station; that he had told the guard of the train that it was a quiet dog; that he had offered the guard a muzzle, but that the guard, on hearing that it was a quiet dog and unaccustomed to being muzzled, had thought it better to leave it unmuzzled. It had a collar on with a chain attached. This evidence the guard corroborated, and further deponed that the dog was quiet during the journey to Edinburgh, when it was tied up in his van in the usual way.

At Edinburgh it had an hour and a-half to wait till the departure of the Perth train. The company have dog kennels at the Waverley Station, but the practice of the company, when a dog has to wait for a short time, is to tie it up in the luggage office; and this was done in the present instance by the porter to whom the guard handed the dog. The porter gave this evidence,—"When I got it (the dog) out of the van I did not like its appearance exactly at first. I clapped it. I led it along very gently to the parcel-office. I let it stop. After it stopped a change came over it. It commenced to bite at the chain very much. I took it to the parcel-office and tied it up there. It was left there for the next train." A parcel deliverer named Ross took it out of the luggage-office in order to put it into the Perth train, but when on the way it broke away and escaped out of the station. The porter followed it through the town until he lost sight of it. This porter's evidence, so far as material, is quoted by Lord Adam.

At the Botanic Gardens it was observed in an apparently excited state by Professor Balfour, the curator of the Gardens, who told three gardeners, one of whom was the pursuer, to chase it out of the Gardens. While they were trying to do so it got entangled in a railing, when they secured it. The two other gardeners went off to get the police, leaving it in charge of the pursuer. While they were absent it inflicted the injuries complained of. It was ultimately taken to the Dogs' Home, where it was condemned by the instructions of the veterinary surgeon, and killed.

The jury returned a verdict for the pursuer, assessing the damages at £30.

The defenders moved for a new trial, and obtained a rule.

The pursuer shewed cause.

LORD PRESIDENT.—My opinion is that this verdict cannot stand, as I think that there is no evidence to support the charge of fault made against the railway company or their servants.

Railway companies are in the habit of carrying dogs or other live animals, and in so doing they are under a certain responsibility, not only towards the owner of the animals, but also towards the public. If a dog is known to be vicious, and the railway company is informed of this, the company is bound to take not only usual but extraordinary precautions to prevent it from escaping and so doing injury to the public, but that is not the kind of case here. The averment that the dog was known to be vicious has, I think, been completely negatived by the evidence of the owner and the guard in whose charge the dog travelled from Kelso. It appears to me that what they did was in the circumstances most judicious. The guard was assured by the owner that the dog was a perfectly good-natured animal, but was told that if he wished to have a muzzle he might have one, and in the exercise of his discretion the guard said he did not want it. Nothing occurred in the course of the journey to shew that the dog was vicious or to lead the guard to change his opinion as to its character. It was delivered at the Waverley Station, where it had an hour and a quarter to wait for the train to Perth, and in accordance with the usual custom it was chained up in the parcel office. Up to this time there was no appearance that anything was wrong with the dog. No doubt it was a little impatient, as dogs are apt to be on a journey, especially such dogs as collies, which are accustomed to plenty of exercise. That was not a thing to excite suspicion or alarm in the mind of anyone accustomed to the habits of dogs. It rather appears that the porter who took the dog from the parcel-office to the train was somewhat new to such work, and not accustomed to the habits of dogs, but I do not know that a railway company is bound to supply servants whose qualifications include a knowledge of the ways of dogs. That is not what one looks for in a railway porter, whose chief requirements perhaps are strength and attentiveness. Well, the dog tried to escape, and so far got the better of the porter, as it contrived to frighten him, and so get loose from his hold. Down to that time no mischief was done, and certainly, as far as I can see, nothing amounting to fault on the part of the railway company or their servant has been proved. It is impossible to say that the railway company's servant was guilty of culpa in the way he dealt with the dog. All that can be said is that the dog escaped.

Then is the railway company to be answerable for all the remote consequences of that escape? I think not. If it could be shewn that the necessary and immediate result of the escape was the injury of someone, it might be a different case, but it is impossible to conceive anything more remote than the injury suffered by the pursuer. I do not wish to say anything harsh, but I must say that I think that the dog was injudiciously treated at the Botanic Gardens. If I felt obliged to follow the case further, I might say that the cause of the pursuer's injury was produced at the Botanic Gardens. I do not, however, put my decision on that ground. I think it is sufficient to say that there is no evidence of fault on the part of the railway company and its servants.

Lord Adam.—I concur. It was the duty of the railway company to use all due precautions for the safe custody of this dog. Such precautions vary with the circumstances of each case, and if the railway company had been informed, as the pursuer alleges on record they were informed, that the dog was vicious, the case would have been quite different. The railway company, however, were not so informed, but, on the contrary, they were informed that it was a quiet dog. So that the precautions necessary in this case were only those required in the case of a quiet dog.

The dog behaved well till it reached Edinburgh, and was taken to the parcel-office at the Waverley Station. The only passage that I can find implying or suggesting any fault on the part of any servant of the company is in the evidence of John Ross, the parcel deliverer, who was examined on behalf of the defenders. He says, "I noticed nothing peculiar about the dog till it was tied up. When it was tied up I noticed that it was very vicious. It seemed to get excited, and snapped at its chain. It did not do any mischief then." The meaning of that, however, I take to be that the dog wanted to be free, and snapped at its chain; I do not think that it is meant to suggest that the dog was in a wild condition. After an hour and a quarter Ross went up to the dog, and found it to be quiet.

Gray v. North British Railway Co.

He says, "About five minutes before one it was time to take the dog to the train. I tried to take it to the train. It went quietly out of the office at first, and made no effort to bite me when I unloosed it." Now, I do not see how it can be suggested that there was any fault on the part of the witness in taking this apparently quiet dog to the train in the way he did. He says further,—"When we got to about opposite the stationmaster's office it began to jump about. It was not very serious; it was just trying to catch hold of its chain. I then began to see that the dog was excited and disposed to bite. I held it by the chain, keeping it at arm's length. It began to try and bite my hand. I held it so that it would not have so much purchase, and kept it on its hind feet. I held it so for three or four minutes, and the whole weight of the dog was on my arm. In the long run I could not hold it any longer, and had to let it go. He overmastered me." In these circumstances, where was the fault on the part of the company? I can see none; and if the case was so put to the jury, as I believe it was, I think there is no evidence to justify the verdict.

That being the case, I do not think it is necessary to go further. I agree, however, that even if the company had been in fault in regard to the dog's escape, they would not be responsible for all the remote consequences of that escape.

With regard to what took place at the Botanic Gardens, the case appears to me to be this. Three of the gardeners had the dog tied to a rope, and if anything happened after that surely they were responsible for it. If it was wrong for the railway officials not to have sent two porters to take the dog to the train, as it was argued it was, surely there was fault on the part of the gardeners, the dog having by this time undoubtedly shewn itself to be vicious, to leave it in the charge of one man. I think their conduct must be held to be the proximate cause of the injury.

LORD M'LAREN.—The obligation which the railway company came under in this case is the same as the obligation undertaken by anyone who has the temporary custody of domestic animals—that is to say, an obligation to take all reasonable and ordinary precautions to prevent the escape of animals whose escape may be productive of mischief. What "reasonable precautions" are depends on the kind of animal which is in question.

In this case there was nothing to suggest that the dog was bad tempered, or that more than the usual precautions were necessary, and I think the pursuer has entirely failed to prove fault on the part of the railway company.

I also agree that the pursuer's injury was not the direct and immediate consequence of the dog's escape. It would have been so if the dog had flown at and bitten a passer-by immediately on escaping. Apparently the dog was doing some harm to the flower beds at the Botanic Gardens, and the pursuer's injury was consequent on an attempt to put the dog out of the Gardens.

LORD KINNEAR and LORD TRAYNER concurred.

COMMERCIAL BANK OF SCOTLAND, LIMITED, Pursuers (Real Raisers). ALFRED HENRY BEAL, Defender and Claimant (Reclaimer).—Sol.-Gen. Pearson— Shennan. M'LENNAN & URQUHART, Defenders and Claimants (Respondents).—C. S. Dickson.

Contract—Penalty—Liquidate damage—Agreement by purchaser to deposit a sum to be forfeited in the event of failing to implement.—In the course of negotiations for the purchase of a business, the intending purchaser agreed to deposit in bank in the joint names of himself and of the seller a certain sum "as part payment of the price." It being stipulated that in the event of his failure "to pay the balance of the purchase-money" before a certain date, the deposit should "be forfeited to" the sellers, "in full satisfaction of all causes of action, and the purchaser shall be bound forthwith to endorse the deposit-receipt" for the money. The purchaser failed to complete the purchase by payment of the purchase price. Held that the sellers were entitled, without going into any proof of damage, to receive the money deposited.

2D DIVISION. Lord Trayner. M.

IN July 1889 negotiations were commenced between Alfred Henry Beal, estate-agent, London, and M'Lennan & Urquhart, brewers, Dalkeith, relative to a sale of the brewery of the latter to a company which it was proposed to form.

By a minute of agreement dated 23d July 1889 entered into between Beal on behalf of himself and of the other proposed purchasers and Mr Robert Menzies, S.S.C., acting on behalf of M'Lennan & Urquhart, the price of £35,000 was agreed upon, and the vendor undertook, inter alia, by article fourth, to prove that the business had been established for more than forty years, and that the net profits had been not less than a certain sum. It was further provided as follows:—(Fifth) "The purchaser hereby agrees to deposit at the London branch of the Commercial Bank of Scotland the sum of £1000 in the joint names of himself and the vendor, and within seven days of the date hereof to inspect, or cause to be inspected, the property and books, and within two days after the completion of such inspection the purchaser shall give the vendor notice, by post, whether he finds that the vendor's statements, as above set forth in the preceding article, have been substantiated or not. If the purchaser should prove that the vendor has failed to implement the undertaking contained in article fourth hereof, then the vendor shall immediately concur in the repayment to the purchaser of the said sum of £1000, and the purchaser and any agent employed by him to inspect the property shall not divulge any information acquired by them in the course of such inspection. If the vendor implements the aforesaid undertaking, the parties shall enter into a more formal agreement, and on the 2d day of September next the purchaser shall deposit a further sum of £4000, and in the event of his failure to make the said deposit, the first mentioned sum of £1000 shall be forfeited to the vendor, and after the said deposits have been made the purchaser shall be bound to pay the purchase price, and to complete the transaction before the 1st day of October next, and failing the payment of the said purchase price within the said period, the amount of the said two deposits shall be forfeited to the vendor, provided always that the vendor shall have produced by that time a full and sufficient title and searches of incumbrances shewing a clear record to the purchaser."

In accordance with this agreement Beal deposited £1000 with the London branch of the Commercial Bank of Scotland, Limited, on 23d July 1889, in the joint names of Mr Menzies and himself.

No. 16.

Nov. 7, 1890. Commercial Bank of Scotland, Limited, v. Beal.

He received evidence that the matters which the vendors agreed to prove were as they had represented.

On 22d August 1889 the formal agreement contemplated in the agreement of 23d July was entered into. By the first article thereof it was provided that the vendors agreed to sell and the purchasers agreed to purchase the brewery, with the plant and goodwill, at the price of £35,000, "whereof £1000 has already been deposited, in the joint names of the said Robert Menzies and the purchaser, with the London branch of the Commercial Bank of Scotland."

The fifth article provided as follows:—"On or before the lapse of six days from the date hereof, the purchaser shall deposit the further sum of £4000 as part of the purchase price, in the joint names of the vendors and the purchaser, with the said branch of the said bank, after which (but not till then) the purchaser shall be entitled to form a limited liability company if he desires to do so, or to sell his said purchase to a company, with or without limited liability, and to advertise the same; and in the event of his failure to make the said deposit of £4000, the deposit of £1000 shall be forfeited to the vendors."

By the sixth article of the agreement the balance of the purchase price was to be paid on or before 31st October 1889.

The eighth article provided,—"If the purchaser shall fail to pay the balance of the said purchase money on or before the 31st day of October 1889, the said two deposits of £1000 and £4000 shall be forfeited to the vendors in full satisfaction of all causes of action, and the purchaser shall be bound forthwith to indorse the deposit-receipts for said two sums, provided always that the vendors shall be able to produce a full and sufficient title and searches of incumbrances shewing a clear record to the purchaser."

Beal, on 24th August 1889, deposited £4000 with the Commercial Bank in joint names of himself and M'Lennan & Urquhart, as provided by the fifth article of the second agreement. The stock in trade was subsequently valued, and the price thereof fixed. M'Lennan & Urquhart also paid off a bond for £2775 which existed over the property.

Beal endeavoured to form the proposed company, but found it impossible to do so, and in consequence the purchase could not be implemented.

A dispute having arisen between Beal and M'Lennan & Urquhart as to the two deposited sums of £1000 and £4000, the Commercial Bank, on 1st March 1890, raised an action of multiplepoinding to have the question of right to the money decided.

The fund in medio consisted of the £1000 and the £4000.

M'Lennan & Urquhart claimed the whole fund in medio. They stated that, in consequence of Mr Beal's failure to implement the contract of sale and of the actings which took place in consequence of the agreements, they had suffered loss to an amount exceeding £5000.

Beal also claimed the whole fund in medio, or, alternatively, the whole fund after deduction of the actual loss sustained by M'Lennan & Urquhart in consequence of his non-implement of the contract. He stated that although M'Lennan & Urquhart were "aware that the successful floating of a company was essential to the completion of the purchase, and that their co-operation was of the highest importance in securing this result, they obstructed and hampered all Mr Beal's efforts. They put difficulties in the way of advertising the prospectus; they delayed signing the memorandum and articles of association; and, generally, they acted in such a way as to render all Mr Beal's efforts nugatory. Although aware of the importance of having his name on the board of directors of the new company, one of their number, Mr Alexander M'Lennan, after verbally agreeing to join the board, and after retaining for about eight days a draft prospectus containing his name as a director, suddenly withdrew his name from the board. After verbally agreeing to take £10,000 of the purchase price in shares, the partners of Messrs M'Lennan & Urquhart resiled from this proposal, and consented to take only £6000 in shares. The result of this conduct was to create an unfavourable impression on the investing public, and the share capital was not fully subscribed. In particular, one gentleman who had undertaken to subscribe £5000 withdrew his offer on learning that Mr Alexander M'Lennan had refused to join the board of directors. A final effort was made to float the company, which would have been successful if the partners of Messrs M'Lennan & Urquhart had consented to increase their holding in shares from £6000 to £9000, but this proposal they declined."

Beal also stated,—"The said sum of £5000 was intended to secure Messrs M'Lennan & Urquhart against any loss actually sustained by them through any failure on Mr Beal's part to carry out his contract, but it was not in the contemplation of the parties that this sum should be regarded as liquidate damages. Mr Beal's non-implement of the contract of purchase was caused entirely by the obstructions and hindrances offered by Messrs M'Lennan & Urquhart, and the partners of their firm. These were contrary to the good faith of the contract, which was entered into by all parties on the clear understanding that it could be carried out only through the formation of a limited liability company. This claimant would never have entered into the agreement of 22d August 1889, above referred to, unless he had been clearly led to understand that he might rely on Messrs M'Lennan & Urquhart's co-operation in floating the proposed company. Any loss which Messrs M'Lennan & Urquhart have suffered is attributable to the actings of themselves and their partners, and is not a loss which ought to be defrayed out of the fund in medio. But it is believed and averred that Messrs M'Lennan & Urquhart have suffered no damage whatever in their business. There was no break in the continuity of its management, and their trade and credit continue as good as they were before the negotiations above narrated. They have therefore no claim on the fund in medio. In any event, however, any damage they have suffered through the transaction in question is of trifling amount, and the sums constituting the fund in medio would be an exorbitant and unreasonable amount to be awarded to them in name of damages."

M'Lennan & Urquhart pleaded;—1. In respect of the agreements founded on, and of Mr Beal's failure to pay the balance of the purchase price, these claimants are entitled to be ranked and preferred in terms of their claim.

Beal pleaded, inter alia;—2. The claimant should be ranked and preferred in terms of the first alternative of his claim in respect that (1) the claimants, Messrs M'Lennan & Urquhart, have suffered no loss; (2) any loss suffered by the said claimants was due entirely to their own actings. 3. Alternatively, the claimant should be ranked and preferred in terms of the second alternative of his claim, in respect that the claim of Messrs M'Lennan & Urquhart is subject to equitable modification, as being exorbitant and unreasonable, and of the nature of a penalty.

On 18th June 1890 the Lord Ordinary (Trayner) ranked and preferred M'Lennan & Urquhart to the whole fund in medio.*

* "OPINION.—The claimants on the fund in medio in this process entered into an agreement, dated 23d July 1889, whereby Messrs M'Lennan & Urquhart (as vendors) agreed to sell, and Mr Beal (as purchaser) agreed to purchase the vendors' brewery plant and appurtenances, at the price of £35,000. The vendors undertook to prove that their business had been established for over

Beal reclaimed, and argued;—It must indeed be admitted that the English case of Wallis v. Smith relied on by the Lord Ordinary was forty years, and that their net profits for the four years preceding the agreement had amounted on an average to not less than a specified sum. The purchaser agreed to deposit with the Commercial Bank £1000, in the joint names of vendors and purchaser, which was to be repaid to the purchaser in the event of the vendors being unable to establish that their business was of the age, and their average profits of the amount represented.

"If on these points the vendors satisfied the purchaser, then a more formal agreement was to be entered into, and the purchaser was to deposit a further sum of £4000; in the event of his failure to make this deposit, the first deposit was 'to be forfeited to the vendor,' and if, after making the second deposit, the purchaser failed to complete the transaction, and pay the whole price before the 1st October 1889, 'the amount of the said two deposits shall be forfeited to the vendor.'

"The first deposit of £1000 was duly made; and the purchaser having been satisfied by the vendors regarding the matters which they had undertaken to prove, the 'more formal agreement' contemplated by the parties was entered into on 22d August 1889, the principal provisions of which, so far as concerns the present case, are as follows:—By Art. 1 the vendors agree to sell, and the purchaser agrees to purchase, the brewery, its plant, appurtenances, goodwill, &c., 'at the price of £35,000 (whereof £1000 has already been deposited).' (Art. 5) Within six days from the date of the agreement the purchaser agrees to deposit the further sum of £4000 'as part of the purchase price,' in the joint names of himself and the vendors; 'and in the event of his failure to make the said deposit of £4000, the deposit of £1000 shall be forfeited to the vendors.' (Art. 8) If the purchaser fails to pay the balance of the purchase money on or before 31st October 1889, 'the said two deposits of £1000 and £4000 shall be forfeited to the vendors, in full satisfaction of all causes of action, and the purchaser shall be bound forthwith to endorse the deposit-receipt for said two sums,' &c.

"The purchaser made the second deposit, but he has failed to make payment of the balance of the price. He cannot now carry through the transaction. He explains in his condescendence and claim the causes which have in some measure at least prevented him from implementing his agreement, and he throws blame on the vendors, whose conduct, he says, has contributed to this result. There is no averment, however, that the vendors have failed in the performance of any part of the agreement which imposed obligations upon them: the purchaser's averments amount only to this, that the vendors have not acted as the purchaser expected they would; and that, if they had acted otherwise, the agreement could have been implemented by the purchaser. The question to be determined, therefore, is this, Seeing that the purchaser has failed to fulfil his part of the agreement, and that there has been no failure therein on the part of the vendors, are the vendors entitled to claim the amount of the foresaid two deposits forfeited to them?

"The purchaser maintains that the provision in the agreement as to forfeiture of the £5000 should be read as meaning that failure on his part to fulfil his agreement should involve a penalty of £5000, and that under the clause so read he is only liable in such damage as the vendors can establish to have been sustained by them through his (the purchaser's) failure to implement; or otherwise that the £5000 should be read as liquidate damage, in which case again the vendors are not entitled to claim the whole stipulated amount, if it appears to the Court that the claim is unconscionable and exorbitant. On the other hand, the vendors maintain that, on the plain words of the agreement, the £5000 was to be forfeited to them in the event which has happened; and that, in any view, it is neither penalty nor liquidate damage, but part payment of price by the purchaser, which he cannot claim back on failure to complete his purchase.

"The questions thus raised appear to me to be attended with difficulty; but directly against the claimant, if it was applicable. But the Scottish law on this matter differed in principle from that of England. By the former there was always room for modification of a stipulated penalty, and there was also room for the modification even of liquidated damage, if unconscionable in amount.[1] The damage actually sustained was all which the Court would allow to be recovered in either of these cases. The words of the obligation pointed to a penalty clause, not to liquidate

I have come to the conclusion that the vendors must prevail. I do not think the clause of forfeiture can be read as a clause merely importing that on failure to implement the purchaser should be liable in a penalty of £5000. Under such a clause the party failing to implement is liable in the whole damage caused by his failure. That damage may be more or less than the amount of the penalty named; but whatever the amount of it may be, that is the measure of his liability, and the measure of the corresponding right.—(Mayne on Damages, 3d ed. 124.) In the present case, the vendors could not under their agreement claim more than £5000 in any case, even if they suffered damage to twice the amount; for they have agreed in express terms that the £5000, if forfeited, shall be 'in full satisfaction of all causes of action.' One of the important elements, therefore, of an ordinary penalty clause is here excluded. Again, the failure on the part of the purchaser to implement his contract might, and most probably would, inflict damage which the vendors would have the greatest difficulty in proving; indeed, might not be able to prove at all, as specific damage. How this attempt to sell their business might affect their own customers if they continued the business, or affect the mind of other purchasers if they endeavoured again to sell it, could never be ascertained. This consideration is very material in determining whether the stipulation is to be read as one merely for penalty or one for liquidate damage (Sainter v. Ferguson, 1849, 7 C. B. 716). On a consideration of the whole agreement, I should therefore be of opinion that the £5000 was treated by the parties as liquidate damage rather than as penalty.

"If treated as liquidate damage, is it exorbitant and unconscionable? I cannot say that it is. The amount claimed is rather more than 14 per cent of the whole price, which is a large percentage, no doubt, but not one which I would characterise as unconscionable, or one which, prima facie, exorbitantly exceeds what might very well be anticipated as the damage likely to arise from non-implement of the contract, and therefore be agreed on and fixed as the damage due and payable in that event.

"But I prefer to put my judgment in favour of the vendors on the grounds set forth as the grounds of judgment in the cases of Hinton v. Sparkes (1868, L. R., 3 C. P. 161), and Wallis v. Smith (1882, L. R., 21 Ch. Div. 243), which resemble the present case in all material respects more closely than any case I can find reported in our own books. In the latter case the Master of the Rolls observed 'That it is of the utmost importance as regards contracts between adults—persons not under disability and at arm's length—that the Courts of law should maintain the performance of the contracts according to the intention of the parties.' I agree with the observation, and have endeavoured to give effect to it here. The parties to this contract were at arm's length, and each quite capable of protecting his own interests. Their intention as regards the £500 deposited does not seem to me to admit of any doubt. They intended, and the said (and said it more than once, for it appears on both the agreements I have referred to), that if the purchaser failed to carry out his contract as agreed upon the deposited money should belong to the vendors. It may have been a bad bargain for the purchaser to make, but it was his bargain, and he cannot complain if he is now held to it."

damage, for the deposits were, in a certain event, to be "forfeited to the vendor." Equity would always interfere, whatever the stipulation might be called, to prevent one party punishing the other or making an unconscionable and oppressive profit at his expense. Such was the profit the respondents claimants were aiming at. A proof ought to be allowed in order that the reclaimer might establish by the books of M'Lennan & Urquhart, and by other evidence, that they had really suffered no loss, and further that they were themselves to blame for the failure of the negotiations. The case of Elphinstone[1] relied upon by the respondents did not affect the doctrine of the cases cited. There the payments which were held to constitute liquidate damage and not penalty were proportionate to the extent of the failure, and it was pointed out by Lord Watson that when a single lump sum was made payable in various events some of which might cause serious and some trifling damage, the presumption was that the sum was a penalty and subject to modification. That was the nature of this case.

Argued for the respondents;—There was truly no difference between the Scottish and English systems on the question of penalty and liquidate damage, as the case of Elphinstone shewed. The cases cited by the Lord Ordinary, and which resembled the present, were therefore authorities in considering the question. The case was truly not one requiring a consideration of the law as to penalty clauses. It was a case of deposit on certain conditions, and the question whether the deposit was to be forfeited by non-fulfilment of these was a question of what the agreement intended. Each deposit was spoken of in the agreement as a part payment or payment to account of the price to be ultimately payable, not as a penalty at all.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The law upon the subject of penalty and of liquidate damages is now well settled. A mere penalty will not be enforced according to its terms, but inquiry will be allowed as to the real amount which the other party has suffered, and the penalty will be modified accordingly.

But this is quite a different case. It is one in which the two parties agree together that, a contract having been entered into, a deposit shall be made by Mr Beal of a certain sum. By a certain stage of the negotiations Mr Beal, the purchaser, deposited £5000 as part of the price of that which he agreed to purchase, and the terms of the deposit were that if he did not fulfil the conditions of purchase that sum of £5000 was to be forfeited to the seller. A distinct contract to that effect is not a stipulation for liquidate damages in any sense, nor a stipulation for a penalty. One can see that parties such as M'Lennan & Urquhart would be unwilling to enter into a contract of sale without being placed in a position of safety in the event of it not being carried into effect. Now, I do not think that any more distinct words could have been used in order to express this arrangement than those which the parties have used. I think that the case is on all-fours with one of these referred to by the Lord Ordinary. The principle of it applies directly, and I have heard nothing to satisfy me that that principle is not according to the law of Scotland.

2D DIVISION I.

IN 1877 Peter Couper, accountant, was, on the petition of Robert Finlay, appointed curator bonis to John Souter.

On 29th August 1890 Finlay presented a petition to the Lord Ordinary in the Bill-Chamber praying for the removal of Couper from the office of curator bonis and for the appointment of another person in his room, stating that the accounts of the curator had been audited by the Accountant of Court down to 30th September 1889, at which date there was a balance brought out due to the curator of £548, 16s. 8d.; and that it had "been ascertained by the petitioner that in February 1879 the said Peter Couper, as curator bonis, applied for and obtained a loan of £400 from the Property Investment Company of Scotland, and that that sum does not appear in his accounts"; that he had left Edinburgh under suspicious circumstances; and that a petition for sequestration of his estates had been presented, and a judicial factor had been appointed thereon.

On 12th September 1890 the Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Rutherfurd Clark), who doubted the competency of the petition before the Bill-Chamber, declined to remove Couper, but appointed Robert Cockburn Millar to be curator bonis ad interim to Souter.

On 15th October Margaret Sproul or Souter, wife of the ward, presented a petition to the Second Division craving the Court to recall the interim appointment, to remove Couper from office, and to appoint a Mr Munro as curator. The petitioner stated the same facts with regard to the disappearance of Couper as were stated in the petition of Finlay.

She further maintained that Finlay's petition was not competent in the Bill-Chamber, and objected to Robert Cockburn Millar, who had been appointed curator bonis ad interim, being appointed curator.

To this petition Mr Finlay and Mr Millar lodged answers, in which they maintained, inter alia, that Finlay's petition, which was now depending before the Junior Lord Ordinary, was competent, and was "the proper course to adopt under the Pupils Protection Act (12 and 13 Vict. c. 51), sec. 31,* and the Distribution of Business Act (20 and 21 Vict. c. 56), sec. 4."* They also stated that the Junior Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) had meantime, on 23d October, ordered service of Finlay's petition on the ward and on Couper.

Argued for Mrs Souter;—The proper course was by petition to the Inner-House. The object was to remove a factor for misconduct, and the petitioner had therefore rightly appealed to the nobile officium of the Court.[1]

Argued for Finlay and Millar;—The petition of Finlay was competent and was in accordance with the Distribution of Business Act as well as of the Pupils Protection Act. There was also authority for the proceeding.[2]

Nov. 8, 1890. Souter v. Finlay.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—Two petitions have been presented for the removal of the curator bonis to John Souter and for the appointment of a new curator bonis. One of them was presented to the Junior Lord Ordinary and the other by another party to this Division of the Court. The question between the parties is one of competency. It appears that doubts were felt by the officials of the Court as to which was the proper tribunal for consideration of the matter in the first instance, and as the point is one which may often occur in practice we thought it right to take time for consideration. Having done so, I do not feel serious difficulty as to the result.

By the Pupils Protection Act, 1849 (12 and 13 Vict. c. 51), sec. 31, it is enacted that "the Court shall have power, on cause shewn, to remove or accept the resignation of any tutor or curator coming under the provisions of this Act, and to appoint a factor loco tutoris or curator bonis in his room"; and "the Court" is defined (sec. 1) to mean "either Division of the Court of Session." There is therefore no question what would be the proper tribunal under that Act.

But in 1857 there was passed the Distribution of Business Act (20 and 21 Vict. c. 56), sec. 4 of which provided that "all summary petitions and applications to the Lords of Council and Session, which are not incident to actions or causes actually depending at the time of presenting the same, shall be brought before the Junior Lord Ordinary officiating in the Outer-House, who shall deal therewith and dispose thereof as to him shall seem just; and, in particular, all petitions and applications falling under any of the descriptions following shall be so enrolled before, and dealt with and disposed of by, the Junior Lord Ordinary, and shall not be taken in the first instance before either of the two Divisions of the Court . . . ." (Subsec. 5) "All petitions, applications, and reports under the Act 12 and 13 Victoria, chapter 51, entituled 'An Act for the better protection of the property of pupils, absent persons, and persons under mental incapacity in Scotland'"—the Pupils Protection Act.

That enactment is distinct and specific. The Junior Lord Ordinary is to be the Judge in the first instance, subject of course to review by the Division.

I therefore conclude that the petition to the Inner-House which is before us is not competent, and that the petition to the Junior Lord Ordinary was the only competent process. But as the matter had been regarded as one of doubt in practice, which it was desirable to remove, I propose that no expenses be found due by the party who presented the petition to the Inner-House.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. The question is purely a question of practice, and I am not surprised that the Clerks of Court and our learned brother Lord Rutherfurd Clark should have felt some doubt upon it. We thought it right, the question being one of practice, to confer with the Judges of the other Division, and they concur with us in our decision. It is now settled, therefore, that such petitions are to be presented in the first instance to the Lord Ordinary.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I concur.

THE COURT dismissed the petition of Mrs Souter.

Selbie v. Saint.

JAMES SELBIE, Pursuer (Appellant).—Watt—Kemp.
GEORGE SAINT, Defender (Respondent).—Ure—Mac Watt.

Reparation—Slander—Privilege—Privilege of litigant in stating matter pertinent to action.—In an action by a tenant against his landlord for damages for breach of contract in taking possession before the expiration of the lease of the shop let to the pursuer, the defender inter alia averred that the tenant had gone to England, and had left the shop in charge of J. S., that J. S. "was seldom sober" during the time he was on the premises.

In an action of damages for slander raised by J. S. against the landlord, held that the defamatory statement made by the landlord in the other action being pertinent to the cause was privileged, and that as the pursuer had failed to set forth facts from which malice could be inferred the action fell to be dismissed.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Aberdeenshire.

I.

THIS action of damages for slander was raised in the Sheriff Court at Peterhead by James Selbie, messenger-at-arms, Peterhead, against George Saint, grocer there, in the following circumstances:—

Saint had let a shop in Peterhead to John Penny, shoemaker, from Whitsunday 1889 to Whitsunday 1890. In October 1889 Penny left Peterhead and gave the charge of the shop to James Selbie. On 11th October Saint ejected Selbie from the shop and after locking the door took away the key.

Penny then raised an action of damages against Saint for breach of contract.

In his defences to this action Saint averred;—(Stat. 2) "The pursuer and Mr Selbie commenced to clear the premises with the evident intention of defrauding defender of his right of hypothec for his rent, but he obtained a warrant from the Court, and sequestrated in security some effects which pursuer or Selbie did not manage to remove." (Stat. 3) "After the sequestration was laid on, Mr Selbie lived on the premises. . . ." (Stat. 4) "Mr Selbie was seldom sober during the time he was on the premises, and he used the same improperly, and was such a nuisance and source of danger that the defender's other tenants complained to him and to the police of Selbie's conduct."

Selbie raised the present action against Saint, in which, after setting forth statement 2 in the defences to Penny's action, and the statement in article 4 that "Mr Selbie was seldom sober during the time he was on the premises," he averred that these statements were "of and concerning the pursuer, are false and slanderous, and were made maliciously and without probable cause."

There was no further statement of facts from which malice could be inferred.

The defender did not dispute having made the averments complained of in his defences to Penny's action. He denied that they were slanderous. He stated that the pursuer was notour bankrupt.

The defender pleaded privilege, and further, that the pursuer's averments were insufficient to support the action.

The Sheriff-substitute (W. A. Brown) allowed a proof.*

* "NOTE.— . . . Looking to the public position claimed by the pursuer, and their own character, I am unable to hold that the expressions complained of are not actionable. The only point on which I have felt any difficulty is whether on the doctrine of Scott v. Turnbull (11 R. 1131) it was not necessary for the pursuer to condescend on facts and circumstances from which malice is to be inferred, but the statement as to the pursuer's course of insobriety appears to me to be both irrelevant and impertinent to the issue which the defender was meeting in the action founded on, and according to the implication of that case, on these conditions such specifications would not be required. . . ."

Selbie v. Saint.

On appeal the Sheriff (Guthrie Smith) ordained the pursuer to find caution for expenses, on the ground that the action was substantially the same as a prior action which the pursuer had brought in the Small Debt Court and had abandoned on the eve of trial, after putting the defender to the expense of preparing for trial, and on his failure to find caution the action was dismissed.

The pursuer appealed, and (besides arguing that in the circumstances caution was unnecessary) contended on the relevancy of the action, that the words complained of though stated in a pleading in Court formed an actionable wrong.

The defender's contention amounted to a claim for an absolute privilege to a litigant to injure a third party by any statement in his pleadings however false and unjustifiable. It was admitted that a witness had such complete privilege, and that a Judge and a counsel also enjoyed it.[1] But it had never been held that a party had such a privilege, and the considerations of public policy which applied to the other cases did not apply to him. Indeed, the case of Williamson v. Umphray[2] settled that they did not. The statements here complained of were not relevant or pertinent to Penny's action.

Argued for the defender;—The action should be dismissed as irrelevant. The statement complained of was used by the defender when defending himself in a law-suit, a highly privileged position. It was relevant to that defence, and, what was alone sufficient, it stated a matter pertinent to the action. This action therefore could not be maintained.[2]

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case is before us on an appeal from the judgment of the Sheriff finding that the pursuer must find caution for expenses. I confess that if I thought that the action was a relevant action which ought to be allowed to proceed—apart from the question of caution for expenses—I should have much difficulty in affirming that judgment in the circumstances.

But the question of the relevancy of the action has been raised and argued, and we are entitled to deal with it, and if our view is adverse to the relevancy it is desirable we should express it and bring the litigation to an end. The objection to the relevancy is that the pursuer avers a case of slander said to be contained in pleadings by the present defender in another action, in which he had to defend himself against proceedings at the instance of a person named Penny. I think that the pursuer has not stated any ground upon which we could hold that his action is relevant. It is certain that in the ordinary case an averment by a party to a suit in Court cannot, if only it is relevant or pertinent to the action in which it is made, form a good ground for an action of damages for slander, at all events if it is not averred that it was made without probable cause and with malice, and that in such a way as I shall presently allude to. Now, was this averment which is complained of relevant or pertinent? The present defender was being sued by Penny for damages for having wrongfully turned out of a house of which he is the owner this pursuer Selbie, whom Penny alleged that he had left there as a caretaker. His defence there included a statement—being that complained of—that Selbie was seldom sober while so employed; that in consequence the premises were not cared for, and goods which were subject to his (the defender's) hypothec were being removed, and that he was therefore justified in acting as he did.

That was a statement which in my opinion is both relevant and pertinent. But it is sufficient that it was pertinent, and that admits of no shadow of doubt. I have therefore no difficulty at all in holding that the pursuer, who now founds his action upon it, has stated no relevant case. He would further require to allege malice and want of probable cause, and it would not be sufficient merely to aver malice. It would be necessary further to aver specific facts from which the malice might be inferred. The law to that effect is now well settled, and although I cannot say I have ever understood the principle upon which that law is based, I am bound to apply the law as it is.

I think this action must be dismissed as irrelevant.

LORD YOUNG and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutors of the Sheriffs, and dismissed the action.

A B v. C B.

A B, Petitioner (Respondent).—Low—Sandeman.
C B, Respondent (Reclaimer).—Guthrie Smith—A. S. D. Thomson.

Curator Bonis—Insanity—Insane delusion—Opposition of alleged incapax—Necessity of cognition.—The wife of a man who was detained in a lunatic asylum presented a petition for the appointment of a curator bonis to her husband. He opposed the petition, maintaining that he ought not to be superseded in the management of his affairs until he had been cognosced upon a brieve from Chancery. He did not dispute the propriety of his being in the asylum, but stated that such delusions as he might labour under in no way interfered with his business capacity. The Court, on a consideration of medical reports obtained by the petitioner, by the respondent, and by the Court, granted the petition.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Kincairney.
C.

ON 10th June 1890 Mrs A B, the wife of C B, presented a petition for the appointment of a curator bonis to her husband, then an inmate of a lunatic asylum. The petitioner stated that her husband was of unsound mind, and was unfitted for the management of his own affairs; and she produced certificates by Dr Grainger Stewart and Dr Heron Watson, and by Dr George W. Balfour and Dr Littlejohn.

Dr Grainger Stewart and Dr Heron Watson stated that they felt it impossible, at the date of their examination on 20th May, "to grant a certificate for the appointment of a curator bonis." They recommended delay, and a further examination after the lapse of a month or six weeks, for the purpose of deciding upon the necessity of appointing a curator.

Dr Balfour, who examined C B on 28th May, and Dr Littlejohn, whose examination took place on 31st May, expressed the opinion, in general terms, that C B was of unsound mind, and incapable of managing or of giving directions for the management of his affairs.

C B lodged answers, in which, without denying that he was of unsound mind, he stated that his mental condition was not such as to incapacitate him from the management of his affairs.

He produced certificates by Drs Clouston and Bramwell, who stated that, on their visit on the 28th June, they found C B coherent and acute in regard to business matters, but, taking into account the whole of the facts elicited at a prolonged examination of his mental condition, they felt unable to give a certificate that he was yet fit to manage his affairs or give directions for their management.

C B's estate consisted of personal property to the amount of about £40,000, which consisted chiefly of shares in various companies.

On 11th July 1890 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney), having heard counsel, remitted to Sir Arthur Mitchell, Chief Commissioner in Lunacy, to examine the petition, answers thereto, and productions, and thereafter to visit the respondent, and to report whether, in his opinion, the respondent "is at present in such a state of mental derangement as to render him incapable of managing or of giving directions for the management of his affairs."

On 4th August Sir Arthur Mitchell reported that he had examined the petition, the answers thereto, and had read and considered numerous documents and letters tending to throw light on the respondent's mental condition, "and I have had three interviews with him. I have now to report that, in my opinion, he is at present of unsound mind, and that, in consequence of this, he is incapable of managing or of giving directions for the management of his affairs. I have arrived at this opinion without hesitation or difficulty."

Thereafter the respondent lodged a minute, in which he "respectfully protests against being deprived of the management of his own affairs on such inquiry as has been made under the present petition, and humbly moves the Court to supersede further procedure under the petition until the question of the respondent's capacity to manage his affairs shall be determined by the verdict of a jury under a brieve for his cognition, to be applied for by the petitioner or any other party having interest."

On 15th August the Lord Ordinary, after a further hearing, appointed Mr Harry Cheyne, W.S., to be curator bonis to the respondent.*

* "OPINION.— . . . The case was debated before me, and the respondent's counsel moved that I should make a remit to the Sheriff to direct an inquiry as to the respondent's state of mind, and report.

"I considered the case so delicate and important that I should then have reported it to the Inner-House, but I thought, considering the differences in the medical certificates, that the case was hardly prepared to be submitted to their Lordships.

"I rather understand that the course of making a remit to the Sheriff, suggested by the respondent's counsel, has not of late years been regarded very favourably, and I considered that I had hardly a right to devolve on the Sheriff a duty which appeared to be my own; and ultimately I came to think that the safest step I could take was to make a remit to a medical gentleman who had not been employed by either party, and whose opinion I could regard as of weight and authority.

"Having ascertained that Sir Arthur Mitchell had not been consulted in the case in such a way as to affect his absolute neutrality, I, on 9th July, remitted to him to examine the petition and answers and productions, and thereafter to visit the respondent, and to report whether, in his opinion, he was in such a state of mental derangement as to render him incapable of managing or of giving directions for the management of his affairs. Sir Arthur Mitchell has now returned a report, stating his opinion, 'without hesitation or difficulty,' that the respondent is at present of unsound mind, and, as a consequence, incapable of managing or of giving directions for the management of his affairs.

"Sir Arthur Mitchell's report is expressed in general terms, but he was good enough to call on me and to explain his views in more detail. It appears that the respondent is, in Sir Arthur's opinion, subject to delusions related to what is known as spiritualism, of such a nature as to render him quite an unsafe guardian of his own property, and which might render him liable to be very readily imposed on by designing people who were aware of his weakness. He entertains besides, Sir Arthur informs me, feelings of mistrust towards his family which cannot be altogether disregarded.

The respondent reclaimed.

Before the hearing the respondent lodged two further reports by medical men as to his mental condition.*

"There have been submitted to me certain documents which were put in the hands of Sir Arthur Mitchell, and I refer in particular to notes of a seance held in the respondent's house, written by him, and to three volumes, also written by him in pencil, purporting to consist of letters addressed to him, although they are really written by himself. It would not, I think, be convenient to describe these documents in this note, but, to my mind, they thoroughly corroborate Sir Arthur Mitchell's opinion, and indeed leave no room for doubt about the serious character of the respondent's delusions.

"The agents for the petitioner and for the respondent have been again heard, and it has been strongly pressed, on behalf of the respondent, that he shewed an intelligent comprehension of his own affairs—which seems to be true—and that he could safely be trusted with them, and in particular that he could not, or ought not, to be deprived of the control of his own property without the verdict of a jury obtained on a brieve from Chancery, under the provisions of the 101st section of the Court of Session Act.

"I have felt the force of this contention, but what, as it appears to me, I have to consider is whether it is right and safe that the respondent should be left without control in the meantime, and until the meeting of the Court.

"A brieve from Chancery cannot proceed at present; and while I do not doubt that the respondent has an intelligent knowledge of his own property, as indeed he has proved, and is probably a gentleman in many respects of ability, still I agree in Sir Arthur Mitchell's view that his considerable property is not safe under his control, so long as he remains under the influence of the singular hallucinations which at present possess him.

"I think therefore that my duty is to appoint a curator bonis. My appointment is, of necessity, substantially, though not nominally, an interim one, if it shall hereafter appear to the Court that the condition of the respondent's mind should be submitted to the consideration of a jury. It rather appears to me, however, to be better for the respondent that a curator bonis should be appointed than that his present state of mind should be submitted to a jury. For, should he shortly recover—and I have not heard anything which precludes that hope—it will be much easier to restore to him the full control of his affairs than it would be if he were found by a jury to be insane.

"I need not say that of course either of the gentlemen suggested by the parties is perfectly qualified for the office of curator; but, as matters stand, I am precluded from availing myself of the assistance of either.

"The following authorities were referred to:—Spiers, 4th July 1851, 23 Jurist, 610; Henderson, 17th July 1851, 23 Jurist, 668, 14 D. 11; Forsyth, 19th July 1862, 24 D. 1435, 34 Scot. "I do not think that cases bearing on the testamentary capacity of persons alleged to be of unsound mind are applicable."

* These reports were dated 7th November 1890. One was by Dr Howden, superintendent of the Montrose Royal Lunatic Asylum, and Dr James Ferguson, Perth. They stated that they had had an interview with the respondent, "conversing with him for about two hours regarding himself and his affairs, as well as general topics. We found him calm and self-possessed in manner, of a high degree of intelligence, with a mind widely and accurately informed, and able to reason on many subjects in a clear and rational manner. He appeared thoroughly familiar with the condition of his financial affairs, and alive to his interest in regard to them." Then, after giving a detailed account of their examination, they stated that they were of opinion "(First) That C B is a

Argued for the respondent;—In principle no one of full age could, against his will, be deprived of the management of his affairs until he had formally been cognosced and declared insane. No doubt the jurisdiction of the Court to appoint curators bonis to persons of alleged incapacity had been sustained in Bryce v. Graham,[1] but the remedy was essentially of a summary and temporary character, intended to prevent immediate danger to the property of the alleged incapax. It was true that the convenience of procedure by summary petition, as contrasted at least with the former procedure under a brieve from Chancery, had led to the practice of making such appointments as a permanent remedy, where there was no opposition on the part of the alleged incapax, and no real doubt of his incapacity; but that practice did not supersede the principle that the only regular method of depriving a man of the management of his affairs was by a cognition; on the contrary, the Court of Session Act of 1868, in providing a new and simple procedure for cognition,[2] had shewn the intention of the Legislature. In order to justify the Court in appointing a curator bonis to an alleged incapax it was essential to prove both his incapacity to manage his property and immediate danger to that property. It was not enough merely to prove mental weakness. Now, the present petitioner failed on both these points. Admitting that the respondent laboured under certain delusions, there was no proof, but the contrary, that these delusions in the slightest degree interfered with his capacity to look after his property. It might be for his advantage to be in an asylum, but his residence there was not incompatible with managing his property. An insane delusion was not necessarily inconsistent with testamentary capacity,[3] nor ought it to be regarded as necessarily inconsistent with business capacity inter vicos.[4] It was said that the respondent had conceived an unreasoning aversion to certain of his relatives. Many people did that, and shewed that they had done so in their wills, but was that a ground for holding person of unsound mind; (second) that, if at large, C B might be dangerous to the persons who are the objects of his suspicions, and that the nature of his delusions unfits him to treat with fairness the members of his own family and household, and renders him liable to be biassed in a similar manner against others; (third) that, nevertheless, he is capable of clearly appreciating his worldly interests in many ways; (fourth) that if management of his affairs includes a just and natural regard to the interests of his family, we do not consider he is worthy of being entrusted with their management; but (fifth) that we are not prepared to say that his mental condition, as ascertained by us, incapacitates him from administering his affairs in other respects."

The other report was by Dr Yellowlees, superintendent of the Glasgow Royal Asylum, in which, after giving a detailed account of his interview with the respondent, the reporter concluded,—"My interview does not justify me in expressing a very definite or conclusive opinion as to C B's mental condition, owing to his extreme reticence and constant fencing with words, notwithstanding that I was sent to see him by his own agent. I believe that C B is conversant with his business affairs and investments, and that he could give directions concerning them, but such directions would be influenced, or swayed, or determined by the presence of delusions as to relatives or others conspiring against him, and desiring to injure him, and might be influenced by insane ideas as to spiritualism and its devotees, supposing C B to entertain such delusions and ideas."

them to be insane? Then it was said that the respondent was subject to spiritualist delusions, and might under their influence dispose of his property unwisely. But the disposal of property was one thing, the management of it another. A sane man of full age might dispose of his property as he pleased, however unwisely or unreasonably in the eyes of his relatives. To deprive him of that right he must be proved to be insane, and a cognition was the only legitimate way of proving that. If, on the other hand, he was—whether from mental or from bodily weakness—incapable of managing his property, the Court would supply that defect by appointing a curator bonis. But of business incapacity in the present instance there was not the slightest evidence; the property indeed, though considerable, was not of a character to require any very great powers of management. The petition ought to be refused; or, at all events, a formal proof of the averments on both sides ought to be allowed. At present there was nothing more than ex parte statements.

Argued for the petitioner;—The respondent was an inmate of a lunatic asylum, and it was not suggested that he had been wrongly placed there, or that he ought now to be released. The onus therefore was on him to shew that he had capacity to manage his affairs. He had failed to discharge that onus. It was clear that he was subject to spiritualist delusions, which, if they did not interfere with his business capacity in the narrowest sense, certainly made it possible that under their influence he might greatly damage his patrimonial interests, and that was sufficient to justify the appointment of a curator bonis. Of the jurisdiction of the Court to make such appointments there could be no doubt. It was in the discretion of the Court whether they would exercise that jurisdiction or leave the matter to be determined upon a brieve from Chancery. Here there could be no doubt of the propriety of making the appointment craved, for the respondent was in all probability on the fair way to complete recovery, and if he was subjected to the excitement of a trial before a jury that would almost certainly undo all the good that had been done—if it did not permanently incapacitate him.

Lord President.—I do not think that it can be disputed, as a general principle of our law, that a man of full age is not to be deprived of the management of his own affairs, except by the verdict of a jury finding him incapable of managing them; but just as little can it be disputed that there has been a practice from a very early period of appointing factors or curators bonis to persons in an infirm state of mental health where it appeared, or might be conjectured, that the infirmity was likely to prove of a merely temporary character. I do not say that the statutes regulating the procedure in regard to the cognition of insane persons, and particularly the last—the Court of Session Act of 1868—in express words confine the issuing of a brieve from Chancery, and the cognition of a person as insane, to cases in which the insanity is obviously of a permanent character, but in general I think it is that sort of case only which ought to be submitted to a jury. Where the incapacity is plainly of a temporary character, the appointment of a curator bonis is obviously the more expedient and proper remedy, and even if there is a doubt as to whether the incapacity is permanent or is merely temporary, I still think that the appointment of a curator bonis is the more judicious remedy in the first instance at least.

The jurisdiction of the Court to appoint curators bonis to manage the estates of persons mentally incapable existed, and was exercised, long before the Act of Sederunt of 1730, but the words of that Act are instructive as shewing the class of cases to which it was intended to apply. It defines the class of persons to whom factors or curators bonis might be appointed to be "pupils not having tutors, and persons absent that have not sufficiently empowered persons to act for them, or who are under some incapacity for the time to manage their own estates"; and the object of the appointment is declared to be "to the end that the estates of such pupils or persons may not suffer in the meantime, but be preserved for their behoof and of all having interest therein." The Pupils Protection Act, 1849, recites these words in its preamble, obviously shewing that it was the intention of the Legislature to continue the special remedy contemplated by the Act of Sederunt and to confine it to the same classes of persons—that is to say, pupils, absent persons, or persons under some incapacity "for the time." It appears to me, therefore, that in cases of alleged mental incapacity the question always is, whether the particular case is to be regarded as one of permanent incapacity, or merely as one of incapacity "for the time"; and the answer to that question of course depends on the evidence laid before the Court.

No. 19.

A B v. C B.

If it had been perfectly clear that there was no possibility of this gentleman ever recovering his mental capacity, I should have been of opinion that the proper course would have been to sue out a brieve of cognition from Chancery; but that is certainly not the state of the facts with which we have here to deal. The respondent, although a person of great mental acuteness, at present appears to be labouring under delusions of a very peculiar and perplexing description, and from the evidence before us, particularly the later evidence,—I mean the report of Drs Howden and Ferguson, and the report of Dr Yellowlees,—I think it is quite plain that his present condition of mind makes it very unsafe to leave him in the management of his own affairs; yet I do not see anything in the medical reports which discourages the hope that his former mental condition may be completely restored by judicious treatment. Even already his residence in the asylum appears to have wrought a considerable improvement, and that being so, it appears to me that it would be rather a strange thing for his relatives —to whom alone such a course would be competent—to sue out a brieve from Chancery with the object of having him formally declared to be insane and permanently deprived of the management of his affairs, subject to the possibility of his being reinstated by a declarator of reconvalescence. Such a remedy is only to be resorted to in extreme cases, and in the present case everything points to the application of a temporary remedy—that is to say, to the appointment of a curator bonis, which is the only temporary remedy known to our law.

It was urged that the respondent himself desired that the question of his mental capacity should be tried by a jury. I confess that I am not disposed to attach much importance to his opinion. Neither he himself nor his legal advisers thought fit to set forth in the answers a demand that the question of his mental capacity should be submitted to the judgment of a jury. But, on second thoughts, after having seen a copy of Sir Arthur Mitchell's report, he, on the 12th August, writes to his law-agents in these terms:—"Having to-day seen a copy of Sir A. Mitchell's report, I still maintain that I am perfectly competent to manage my own affairs, and I wish you to insist on the question of my capacity being tried by a jury. I cannot consent to the appointment of a curator bonis; still, if one must be appointed, I wish Mr William Mitchell, S.S.C., to be appointed." And, accordingly, a minute is lodged in which the respondent "respectfully protests against being deprived of the management of his own affairs on such inquiry as has been made under the present petition, and humbly moves the Court to supersede further procedure under the petition until the question of the respondent's capacity to manage his affairs shall be determined by the verdict of a jury under a brieve for his cognition, to be applied for by the petitioner or any other party having interest." Now, if this suggestion had come from anyone else I should have said that it was the suggestion of an enemy. I can hardly conceive anything more likely to retard this gentleman's recovery than an inquiry into his mental condition before a jury. If there is one course more probable than another to make him permanently mad, it is the course suggested in this letter and minute.

I see no reason to doubt, in the first place, that this gentleman's present mental condition is such as to make him unfit to manage his own affairs in the meantime; and, in the second place, I think it is quite possible, if it is not probable, that he may at some future time be in such a state as to make it safe that he should be restored to the uncontrolled management of his affairs. I therefore think that the Lord Ordinary has taken the proper course in appointing a curator bonis.

Lord Adam.—I agree, and have very little to add. There is no doubt of the competency of such a proceeding as this. It is a proceeding which is independent of the ordinary process of cognition upon a brieve from Chancery, and is further the more suitable course to adopt where the unsoundness of mind is not likely to be enduring, for if the person recovers his mental capacity, the curatory may easily be recalled; if on the other hand it becomes apparent that the unsoundness of mind is of a permanent character, the appointment of a curator bonis does not preclude the nearest male agnate from suing out a brieve of cognition in the usual way. That is my view upon the competency of this petition, and the only remaining question is as to the expediency of the appointment in this instance.

The main matter for consideration is, what is the course most conducive to the benefit of the man himself? Now, his case is peculiar in this respect, that he is now in a lunatic asylum, and is admittedly of unsound mind. He does not himself say in the answers that he is of sound mind. His case is, that while he is of unsound mind he is not of unsound mind to the extent of being unfit to manage his own business affairs. But upon the evidence before us in the form of medical certificates—and some of these were obtained at his own instance—it is clear that his mental unsoundness goes a great deal further than this. [His Lordship then referred to some parts of the medical reports and proceeded]—Now, the question is whether it is right and proper that a person so described should have the management of his affairs in his own hands, and to that question I say no.

Lord M'Laren.—Some important questions have been argued in this case regarding the jurisdiction of this Court, or rather the manner in which the jurisdiction ought to be exercised for the benefit of those unfortunate persons who are afflicted with mental derangement. I wish to make an observation as to one of the points that were raised in the argument,—viz., whether all such questions should not be tried by a jury when an issue of fact as to sanity or insanity is clearly raised. Now, that undoubtedly is the mode of trial where the issue of insanity is raised under a brieve of cognition. But I should be sorry to give countenance to the supposition that this is the only way in which a question of mental capacity can be investigated with a view to making provision for the care of the person and the property of the insane. The process of cognition never has been within the historical period the only process for determining such questions. It is strictly a proceeding for the appointment of a tutor of law, and can only be instituted by some person claiming that office as of right. But along with the process of cognition there have subsisted other modes of providing for the care of the property and the person of the insane which, if not as old as the process of cognition, may at least lay claim to a respectable antiquity. One of these is the process of curatory, the origin of which your Lordship has traced, and there is also the jurisdiction originally exercised by the Court of Exchequer, and now by the Court of Session, in the appointment of tutors-dative to insane persons in cases where the tutor at law does not choose to act. We do not have many applications for the appointment of tutor-dative,—I suppose because it is a gratuitous office, and because it is more convenient that such estates should be managed on the footing of professional responsibility by agents who make it their business, and who are paid for their services. But in either case the mode of inquiry has in general been the same. The Court has proceeded partly on the reports of professional persons submitted to it, and partly, at least in all cases of doubt or difficulty, on the reports of experts selected by the Court itself, for the purpose of informing itself as to the true state of mind of the person interested. I am far from saying that there may not be cases where it is necessary that a proof or inquiry of a more formal character should be undertaken. If, for example, a defender who up to the date of the presentation of the petition was in the management of his affairs, and was considered by all his friends to be of sound mind, should be made the subject of an application of this kind, and if answers are given in amounting to a substantive denial of all the petitioner's allegations as to the defender's mental condition, I do not doubt that we should deal with such a case either by dismissing the application (leaving the question to be tried under a brieve of cognition), or by remitting the question raised in the petition and answers for trial by a Judge with or without the assistance of a jury as might be judged expedient. But as your Lordship has pointed out no such issue is raised in the present case. In their answers the respondent's advisers very properly admit,—what they must know to be consistent with fact,—that the mind of the respondent is to a certain extent clouded, and they only raise the question whether this state of cerebral or mental disease is of such a character as makes it necessary that he should be deprived in the meantime of the conduct and control of his affairs. That, I apprehend, is properly a question to be dealt with according to judicial discretion, and it would be quite contrary to our inveterate practice, and I think not consistent with good sense, that for the purpose of settling such a question we should resort to the more elaborate forms of jury trial and proof in open Court, modes of proceeding which could hardly fail to be injurious to the health of the person whose interests we are considering.

No. 19.

A B v. C B.

I am therefore of opinion that the Lord Ordinary has properly dealt with this case, having before him the opinions of very competent men, and amongst others the highest authority in Scotland—as high authority as exists anywhere,—viz., that of the Chief Commissioner of Lunacy.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

Drysdale & Gilmour v. Liquidator of International Exhibition of Electrical Engineering and Inventions.

DRYSDALE & GILMOUR, Petitioners.—Asher—C. S. Dickson.

JAMES ALEX. ROBERTSON, C.A. (Liquidator of International Exhibition Association of Electrical Engineering and Inventions).—Murray—A. S. D. Thomson.

Company—Winding-up—Creditor—Voluntary winding-up placed under supervision—Resolution to wind up—Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 89), secs. 79 and 129.—A company was incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1886, for the purpose, inter alia, of carrying on an Exhibition of Electrical Engineering, &c. "during the year 1890." A few days before 1st November, when the Exhibition was to be closed, a creditor presented a petition stating that the company was unable to pay its debts, and praying that it be wound up by the Court.

On 5th November the company at a general meeting passed a resolution that the company should be wound up voluntarily, and appointed a liquidator. The liquidator, with concurrence of certain creditors, applied to the Court by a note in the creditor's petition for an order placing the voluntary liquidation under the supervision of the Court.

The creditor opposed the prayer of the note, maintaining (1) that the resolution was incompetent, on the ground that all the purposes of the company had not been fulfilled, and that the company ought to have proceeded by way of special resolution duly confirmed, or by an extraordinary resolution; and (2) that, seeing the company was unable to pay its debts, the petitioner, as a creditor, was entitled to an order for a winding-up by the Court.

The Court held (1) that the resolution (though neither extraordinary nor special) was competent under sec. 129,* subsec. (1), of the Companies Act, 1862; (2) that notwithstanding the prior petition by the creditor for judicial liquidation, the voluntary liquidation was lawful and expedient, and ought not to be interfered with; and (3) that the note by the liquidator in the creditor's petition craving an order placing the liquidation under the supervision of the Court should be granted, and the appointment of the liquidator confirmed. The creditor's petition was accordingly refused.

2D DIVISION. I.

THE INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION ASSOCIATION OF ELECTRICAL ENGINEERING AND INVENTIONS was formed in 1889. The association was limited by guarantee.

The objects for which it was established were, as stated in the memorandum of association, inter alia, as follows:—"(a) To open and to carry on during the year 1890 an exhibition in or near Edinburgh, in the county of Midlothian, of engineering, inventions, manufactures, products, industries, and material resources of all nations, and of the machinery and appliances relating thereto, and of all articles illustrative of science and art."

Other purposes were to purchase or take on lease real or personal property, including ground and buildings for the exhibition, to construct buildings for the exhibition, and to use them or let them on lease, to sell and dispose of the same, and also "(f) To allocate spaces to exhibitors,"

* Section 129 of the Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 89), enacts,—"A company under this Act may be wound up voluntarily, (1) whenever the period, if any, fixed for the duration of the company by the articles of association, expires, or whenever the event, if any, occurs, upon the occurrence of which it is provided by the articles of association that the company is to be dissolved, and the company in general meeting has passed a resolution requiring the company to be wound up voluntarily; (2) whenever the company has passed a special resolution requiring the company to be wound up voluntarily; (3) whenever the company has passed an extraordinary resolution to the effect that it has been proved to their satisfaction that the company cannot, by reason of its liabilities, continue its business, and that it is advisable to wind up the company. . . ."

&c., "and to make the whole funds so obtained available for defraying the expenses incurred by the association in organising, promoting, and conducting the exhibition, and in winding up the affairs of the association, and otherwise, in so far as the same shall be required for such purposes."

The 41st article provided,—"The association shall be wound up voluntarily as soon as convenient after the fulfilment of the purposes for which it is established."

On or about 21st October 1890, the period at which the exhibition was to be closed being Saturday, 1st November 1890, the Executive Council of the association issued to the members a notice calling a meeting for Wednesday, 5th November, to consider, inter alia, the following resolution:—"That the purposes for which the association was established having now been fulfilled, it is now required by the association, in general meeting assembled, that the same be wound up voluntarily, and the meeting hereby resolve that the association be wound up voluntarily."

On 29th October 1890 a petition for the winding up of the association by the Court was presented by Drysdale & Gilmour, contractors. The petitioners stated that they were creditors of the company to the amount of £9000; that a preference was, it was feared, being secured by the British Linen Company Bank, to whom the guarantee letters of the guarantors had been hypothecated; and that "the association is unable to pay its debts, and it is just and equitable that it should be wound up."

An order for intimation and service was obtained on this petition on 29th October.

On 5th November 1890 the meeting of the association was held, and the resolution, of which intimation had been given, was proposed and unanimously passed.

A resolution was also passed that Mr J. A. Robertson, C.A., be appointed liquidator, and a committee were nominated to advise with him.

Mr Robertson was directed by the meeting to apply to the Court to have the liquidation placed under the supervision of the Court.

On 7th November 1890 Mr Robertson presented to the Court a note in the petition of Drysdale & Gilmour praying for an order that the voluntary winding-up should be continued, but subject to the supervision of the Court, and also praying the Court to confirm his appointment as liquidator; and, further, to find Drysdale & Gilmour entitled to the expenses of the petition at their instance, and to direct the same to be expenses in the liquidation.

The note stated that creditors for a large amount concurred with the liquidator in making the application.

Argued for Drysdale & Gilmour;—The liquidation was a creditor's liquidation, for it was clear that there was hopeless insolvency. The contention of the liquidator amounted to this, that the company, the debtor, should elect its own trustee and decide the manner of its own winding-up. The resolution to wind up was incompetent. It ought to have been by special resolution duly confirmed fourteen days after its date. In short, the association should have proceeded under subsec. (2) or (3) of sec. 129 of the Companies Act, 1862, and not under subsec. (1). The circumstances were not those which the 1st subsec. contemplated. The words "whenever the period, if any, fixed for the duration of the company by the articles of association expires" could not apply, because there was no period fixed by the articles of the association. The memorandum said only that an exhibition was to be carried on "during the year 1890." Nor could the following words apply, viz.:—"Whenever the event, if any, occurs upon the occurrence of which it is provided by the articles of association that the company is to be dissolved, and the company in general meeting has passed a resolution requiring the company to be wound up voluntarily." There was no such article of association, and, further, such event had not occurred in this case. There were other objects of the company to be fulfilled. It had still the object unfulfilled of ingathering charges for space, for rent of its property, and the object of selling its buildings, and of dividing its surplus, if any. The resolution was therefore incompetent. Besides, "winding-up" was different from "dissolution." A company subsisted during a winding-up and fell to be "dissolved" only when that process was finished. Drysdale & Gilmour had an interest to have a winding-up order on their petition, for if the winding-up was on their petition its date would be 29th October, while if the prayer of the voluntary liquidator were granted its date would be 5th November. Preferences might depend on the intervening period. It was certain that the bank was attempting to gain such a preference. A creditor was entitled to have such an order, or, at all events, it took a very special case to deprive him of the right.[1]

Lastly, the note was incompetent. A liquidator could not ask for a supervision order, but only a creditor, a contributory, or the company could do so.[2]

Counsel for the liquidator was not called on as to the competency of the resolution to wind up. He stated at the bar that twenty-two creditors, whose claims amounted to £6000, concurred in the liquidator's note. Further, that no preferences were being acquired, and that the liquidator had already entered on his duties and ingathered considerable funds.

At advising, the opinion of the Court (Lords Young, Wellwood, and Stormonth Darling) was delivered by LORD YOUNG.—We have considered this case, and we are all of opinion that the voluntary liquidation which is going on now is lawful, and that there are no sufficient reasons why we should interfere with it by putting the association under another form of liquidation and another liquidator. The result is that we will refuse the petition for judicial liquidation at the instance of Drysdale & Gilmour, and substantially—the form of the order may be matter for consideration—accede to the prayer of the note,—that is, to sanction the voluntary liquidation under the supervision of the Court, and confirm the appointment of the liquidator and of the gentlemen who have been nominated to advise with him. The result is simply this, that as the association must be wound up, we think that winding-up under voluntary liquidation is lawful, competent, and upon the whole the most expedient.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Having resumed consideration of the petition, with the note for James Alexander Robertson chartered accountant, Edinburgh, No. 20 of process, allow the said note to be amended at the bar, and the same having been amended accordingly, direct and ordain that the voluntary winding-up of the International Exhibition Association of Electrical Engineering and Inventions, 1890, resolved on by the resolution passed at the general meeting of the said association, held on 5th November 1890, be continued, but subject to the supervision of the Court Confirm the appointment of the said James Alexander Robertson as liquidator of the said association in terms of and with all the powers conferred by the Companies Act, 1862, and Acts amending and extending the same: Also confirm the appointment of Sir Writ—Testament—Holograph—Adoption of writing not holograph—Will partly printed, partly holograph.—A B, a domiciled Scotsman, resident in Shanghai, filled up, dated, and signed a printed form of a will drawn in English style, but left the annexed attestation schedule blank, there being no subscribing witnesses. The form contained blanks (1) for the name of the testator, (2) for the names of the legatees, and (3) for the name of an executor. In the first A B inserted his own name and designation, in the second the names of his two brothers, and the words "equally and jointly, if one deceased to the survivor only," and in the third the name of a friend. The words of bequest and the description of the subjects were in print. The whole document, with the manuscript insertions, read as a bequest by A B of his whole heritable and moveable property to his two brothers. The execution of the will was defective according to the law of England, the lex loci, but it was founded on as a valid will by the law of Scotland. Held (diss. Lord M'Laren) that the document could not receive effect as a holograph will.

THOMAS JOHNSTONE MACDONALD, merchant at Shanghai, in China, died there on 12th September 1887. He was by birth a Scotsman, and was at the date of his death domiciled in Scotland.

1st DIVISION. C.

After his death the following document was found in his desk at Shanghai. It consisted of a printed form of testament, having originally blanks for the insertion of various particulars. The particulars which had been filled into these blanks were in the handwriting of the deceased, and he had signed his name at the end. In the copy here given the portions in Roman type shew what was in the document as printed; the italic type shews what the deceased wrote. The deceased left no other document of a testamentary character:—

"THIS is the last WILL and TESTAMENT of me, Thomas Johnstone Macdonald, of Shanghai.

I direct that all my just Debts and Funeral and Testamentary Expenses be paid and satisfied by my Execut*or* hereinafter named, as soon as conveniently may be after my decease. I give, devise, and bequeath

And I nominate, constitute, and appoint Edward Ogilvie Arbuthnot, of Shanghai, to be Executor of this my WILL; and hereby revoking all former or other WILLS and TESTAMENTS by me at any time heretofore made, I declare this to be my last WILL and TESTAMENT. IN WITNESS WHEREOF, I, the said Thomas Johnstone Macdonald, have to this my last WILL and TESTAMENT set my Hand the twenty-third day of July, in the year of Our Lord One Thousand Eight Hundred and Eighty Three. *T. Signature of Witnesses.

This was a special case presented to determine the validity of the foregoing document.

The first parties were the two brothers of the deceased mentioned in the deed. The second parties were certain of his heirs ab intestato.

The foregoing facts were stated in the case. It was further stated that the law of Shanghai, where the deed was made, was the law of England, and that by the law of England the document in question was invalid as a will in respect it was not attested by two or more subscribing witnesses.

The question of law was:—"Is the document referred to in the foregoing case a valid will according to the law of Scotland?"

The first parties maintained the affirmative. The second parties maintained that the document was not valid as a will in respect that it was not holograph of the deceased; that its essential or substantial parts were neither in his handwriting nor were they adopted by him as holograph, and that the document had annexed to and incorporated with it a form of attestation by witnesses, in terms appropriate to its execution before witnesses, in accordance with the forms required by the law of the place where it was made. It was therefore ex facie intended by the deceased to be executed with the solemnities of that law, or at least to remain inoperative unless and until acknowledged in the presence of witnesses, and the deceased having prescribed solemnities to himself, the document was invalidly executed according to the law of Scotland in respect of non-compliance with these solemnities.

Argued for the first parties;—The document here was effectual as the will of the deceased either because the non-holograph portions had been adopted by the deceased as holograph, or because it was holograph in essentialibus. A non-holograph or partly non-holograph deed might be adopted as holograph,[1] and such adoption need not be express; "indubitable implication" was enough.[2] In M'Intyre v. M'Farlane's Trustees[3] the holograph words "I add to this" had been held sufficient to infer adoption. Here it was impossible to look at the paper without inferring, from the careful way in which all the blanks were filled up, that the testator intended the printed portions to stand as parts of his will—reading the whole together, there was a complete sequence of ideas. It was not a case of adoption in the sense of the incorporation of an invalid deed into a valid one. What the deceased had done was to say by implication that he meant the deed as a whole to stand as his will. It was not the true test to take the holograph words by themselves in the first instance, and treat the non-holograph words pro non existentibus. On the contrary, the import and effect of the holograph words was much influenced by the company in which they were found, and their position on the paper.[1] Applying that test there could be no reasonable doubt here. The main object of the solemnities of authentication was security against forgery, and the exception of holograph writs was because, as Lord Stair observed, they were "unquestionably the strongest probation by writ and least imitable."[2] The principle of that exception applied where the non-holograph words were not in writing but in print, for there was practically no danger of fabrication in such a case, less perhaps than in the case of a writing wholly holograph. The provisions of the Titles to Land Act, 1868,* and the Conveyancing Act, 1874,† applied only to cases in which the written portions were not holograph of the subscribers. Then the writing was holograph in essentialibus. Words of gift were not essential,[3] a bond had been found to be holograph in which only the debtor's name, the sum, and the dates were holograph.[4] Here there was the name and designation of the deceased and his subscription, there was a destination to his two brothers which was unequivocal, and there was a date. There were therefore the essentialia of the will of this man, for essentialia did not mean the elements which distinguish a will as such from other classes of deeds, but the elements which distinguish the will of the deceased from other wills. If the document down to the subscription was to be treated as holograph, the circumstances that these blanks in the attestation clause were not filled up and that there were no subscribing witnesses were immaterial; the deed stood on its own holograph character, and attestation was unnecessary. Even if attestation was ineffectually attempted, that would not deprive the deed of the privileges of a holograph deed.[5] The testator had not here prescribed attestation as a special solemnity, as in the case of Nasmyth v. Hare.[6]

Argued for the second parties;—Non-holograph words might be adopted as holograph, and there might be adoption, or validation, by anticipation when a valid deed contained a clause dispensing with solemnities in future deeds. But in either case the intention to adopt or to validate must be expressed in written words, intelligible in themselves, and subscribed. Actual words of adoption might not indeed be necessary, if an intention to adopt was fairly to be inferred from the language used; in that sense there might be adoption by implication. Here, however, there was not a single completely holograph sentence from the beginning to the end of the deed, and to imply an intention to adopt from the position of isolated holograph words in the paper—which was the implication founded on by the other side—was in effect to infer testamentary intention from what the testator had done, not from what he had written. Mortis causa deeds were in the matter of adoption to be distinguished from deeds inter vivos, which were intended to be acted on.[1] Then admitting that intention to adopt was competently established, the whole non-holograph words must be held to be adopted, including the attestation form. Attestation was unnecessary in a holograph deed, but a testator might prescribe such additional solemnities as he saw fit,[2] and here the deceased, if he intended to adopt at all, must be held to have intended the solemnity of attestation, for if he did not, he would have deleted the attestation form. The first parties founded on the care with which the deceased had filled up the blanks as shewing his intention; therefore what he did not delete he must be held to have intended to remain. Then the deed was wanting, quoad its holograph portions, in the essentialia of a testamentary deed.[3] There were no words of gift nor any words which unequivocally shewed an intention to give; and there was an entire uncertainty as to the subject of the alleged gift. As far as the holograph words went, it might be the whole estate of the deceased or a part only. In reality the case on the other side came to this, that the deed should stand because the non-holograph words were in print not in writing, but the law of Scotland did not attach any privilege to printed words, they were simply non-holograph. The Titles to Land Act of 1868[4] required that the name of the writer should be specified in the case of deeds partly printed and partly written; and the Conveyancing Act of 1874[5] in dispensing with the name of the writer plainly contemplated that a partly printed deed should be tested.

Lord President.—Mr Thomas Johnstone M'Donald was a domiciled Scotsman, but at the time of his death he was resident in Shanghai, and he made the document here in question at that place. It is quite apparent upon the face of the document that there was an attempt made to make a will according to the law of the place where he was resident, that is according to the forms of the law of that place, and if he had succeeded in doing that his will would have been valid, because by the common law of Scotland the will of a domiciled Scotsman is valid if it is made either according to the forms prescribed by the law of his domicile or according to the forms prescribed by the law of the place in which he was resident at the time when the will was made. Now, we have it as a matter of joint statement by the parties that the law of England is the law of the place where this will was made, and that by English law it is essential to the validity of a will that the testator's signature be made or acknowledged by him in the presence of two or more witnesses, who shall also attest and subscribe the will. Now, the document here in question is not subscribed by any witnesses at all, so that it can hardly be said to be a will made according to the forms of the law of the place in which the deceased was resident. And it is equally clear that the document does not comply with the law of the domicile of the deceased,—that is, the law of Scotland,—in regard to the attestation of written instruments, because the forms prescribed by the law of Scotland for the attestation of wills are the forms prescribed for the attestation of all written instruments. We have no statutory rules peculiar to wills as they have in England; all the rules regarding the attestation of written instruments with us are equally applicable to testamentary writings and to deeds inter vivos, and it cannot be said that this document complies with any of the solemnities required by the law of Scotland for the attestation of written instruments. Therefore the only resource left to those who are supporting the will is to maintain that this is a holograph writing of the testator, because if it be holograph of the testator the law of Scotland will recognise it as valid, no matter where it is made. The question then comes to be whether this document can be regarded in any sense as a holograph will.

Now it is very difficult to believe that the deceased intended the document to be a holograph will, because he adopts a printed form—a skeleton of a will—intended to be completed according to the forms of the law of England. It contains not merely a declaration of his purposes and a statement of various things which are necessary to the expression of a testator's intention, but it also bears that it is "sealed, published, and delivered as and for the last will and testament of the said in the presence of us, who in his presence and in the presence of each other, all being present at the same time, have hereunto set our hands as witnesses thereto on the day of the date written." Now he makes no use of that testing-clause at all. He leaves that entirely blank except in so far as printed, and he contents himself with merely subscribing his name above that testing-clause and at the end of the document, which consists partly of printing and partly of certain words written by himself. It was maintained that the portion of the will written by the deceased himself is sufficient to shew what his intention was, and that if his intention can be gathered from these written words, the whole ought to receive effect as being holograph of the testator. But there are great difficulties in the way of sustaining that argument. The only parts of the document of any importance which are filled up in the hand of the testator are, in the first place, his own name and designation at the commencement; in the second place, the names of two persons who are apparently intended to benefit by the will; and, in the third place, the name of a person who is apparently intended to be executor. The words in writing do not appoint the executor. They merely express the name and designation of the supposed executor, but they fill up the clause which begins in print, "I nominate, constitute, and appoint." That is the entire writing under the hand of the deceased—his own designation, the name and designation of parties who are apparently intended to be benefited, and the name of a person inserted in the skeleton clause of nomination of executors. In the writing of the deceased we have no words of gift or bequest at all, and therefore, in so far as his writing is concerned, there is no evidence that he intends to make a gift or bequest. Then we have no description in the writing of the deceased of what he intends to give or bequeath. It may be the whole of his estate or it may be a part of his estate. The print no doubt informs us that it is the whole of his estate, but so far as his own writing goes that is a blank. In short, of the essentials of a will there seem to me to be two of the most important absolutely wanting in that part of the document which is in the handwriting of the deceased, namely, words of gift or bequest, and words descriptive of the subject of the gift or bequest. In these circumstances I find myself bound to come to the conclusion, although somewhat unwillingly, that this is an invalid will and cannot receive effect.

Nov. 14, 1890. Macdonald v. Cuthbertson.

A good deal of argument was addressed to us upon the analogy of cases in which writings not holograph were sustained because they had been adopted as holograph. I cannot see the application of that law to the present case. If at the end of this document there had been a writing holograph of the deceased, saying,—"I adopt the whole of the above, both printed and written, as holograph, and declare it to be my last will and testament," that would have brought the case within the purview of the authorities to which we were referred. But we have nothing in the least degree approaching to that. We have nothing but the signature of the supposed testator, and therefore I think that the doctrine of adoption, as applicable to holograph and non-holograph instruments, has no place in the present case. I am therefore for finding that this will is invalid.

Lord Adam.—The only question we are asked is this,—"Is the document printed in the appendix a valid will according to the law of Scotland?" According to my view of the law of Scotland, I understand that a will to be valid must be a probative will. It must either be holograph or tested. The particular document with which we are dealing is not tested, and therefore the question arises, whether it is holograph in the sense which the law requires. I quite concur in thinking that a writing to be holograph does not require to be wholly in the handwriting of the maker, but I entirely adopt Mr Bell's statement of the law of what a holograph document is when he says that holograph writings are wholly or in the essential parts written by the party and subscribed by him. I think that is a correct description of what a writing, professing to be holograph, must be. If that be so, the question that remains is this, whether or no this document which we are considering is in the handwriting of the subscriber in its essential parts. I agree with your Lordship that this document is not in its essential parts in the handwriting of the maker. All that we have in the handwriting of the maker are some names of parties who may or may not be intended to take benefit. Reading only what is written, it is impossible to make sense out of this document. In the writing of the granter, it has no directions to give his estates to anyone,—no words of will, and when you come to what is most material—the subject of the grant—that is found to be entirely in print. Now that being the character of this document, I can come to no other conclusion than this, that it is not in its essential parts in the handwriting of the maker. There is the peculiarity that the non-holograph parts, instead of being in the handwriting of another, happen to be printed, but to my mind that makes not the slightest difference in the consideration of the case. If the essential parts are not holograph, it is no matter how much of the rest may be written, how much printed. What we must look to is not the foreign element, but the necessary element. Upon these grounds, I have come to the conclusion that this document is not a valid will according to the law of Scotland. I may say that I do not think any question of intention arises here. I think it is likely enough that Mr Macdonald did intend to make a valid will, but then he did not carry his intention validly into effect, because he did not comply with those things which I think are requisite by the law of Scotland to make a valid will.

A great deal was said at the discussion about the adoption of non-holograph writings. Upon that matter I agree with your Lordship. In order to the adoption of an informal writing you must have a probative writing stand ing by itself, either holograph or tested, which expresses the matter of the adoption. No. 21.

Macdonald v. Cuthbertson.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am quite alive to the inconvenience arising from the expression of differences of opinion in matters relating to wills and conveyancing, but as I have formed a clear opinion in this case in favour of the validity of the will I feel bound to state it. I do so the more willingly that these questions often come up in new and unexpected forms, and I am by no means certain that we have got to the end of this chapter of our law.

I approach the consideration of this case from a somewhat different point of view from that which your Lordships have chosen. I think the first question to be considered is whether this is a document of a class which by our statute law must be authenticated by witnesses. The objection which is taken to it is that it is not subscribed by witnesses, nor are any witnesses mentioned as having been present at its execution. Now, our law upon that subject I need hardly say is purely statutory. It is sufficiently evident from the statements of our institutional writers and from history that prior to the statutes with which we are familiar the law recognised no broad distinction between deeds written by the granter himself and those written for him by another hand. In either case all that was necessary as matter of solemnity was that the deed should be signed and sealed, or sealed without being signed; and although for greater security it was usual to call in witnesses these were not necessarily instrumentary witnesses. They were not required as matter of solemnity to subscribe the deed, nor was it necessary that their names should be inserted in the deed. Not to over-elaborate this question, but coming at once to the Act of 1681, I find that there the subscription by witnesses and the requirement of the designation of the witnesses and the writer's name are all treated as one series of solemnities which were necessary to the validity of the deed, and therefore, if it had not been that the writer and witnesses are classed together in the statute, there is nothing in the words of the Act which would exclude its application to holograph deeds. But apparently, just because the statute speaks of the writer and witnesses, its operation has uniformly been limited by authority and practice to the case where the deed is written by a hand other than that of the granter; and I take it that the distinction between deeds holograph and deeds not holograph means nothing more than this: that the one is the case of a deed written by a clerk's hand, and falling under the statute, and the other includes all deeds which are not of that description. Stair and Erskine, in treating of holograph deeds, speak of them expressly as exceptions to the operation of the statute. When they speak of a deed as being holograph, provided it is holograph in the essential parts, they are evidently treating of the case of a deed which is partly written in the hand of a different person, but has important portions inserted in the granter's own hand, and these are regarded as holograph deeds. I do not find that our writers treat at all of the case of a printed form filled up in the granter's hand, and I see nothing in their writings to exclude the proposition that such a deed may be a holograph deed. The case, in the absence of authority, must be treated very much as one of impression. It appears to me that, where everything that is necessary to convert the printed schedule into a deed having a real meaning and application to the circumstances of the case is filled up in the handwriting of the granter, that is in truth and in substance a holograph deed, and it is only a verbal criticism to say that it is not strictly holograph, because all the reasons which lead to the exception of holograph deeds from the statute apply to a case of this kind. The main reason is the impossibility of interpolation. In the case of a deed admitted to be holograph, unless the granter's hand be actually forged, which is a case no authentication can guard against, you have the certainty that whatever was written there by the granter was meant to be part of his deed. In the case of a deed written by another hand you have not that certainty, because there may be the interpolation of pages, marginal additions, erasures, &c., and there is nothing to shew whether these were done before or after subscription. The will we have under consideration fulfils this requisite of a holograph deed: that every word in it authenticates itself, because it is in the handwriting of the granter. It is quite true that if you take the manuscript words without the printed words you cannot make sense of the will. That observation would apply to every instrument which could be prepared in such form. It may be said, with equal truth and propriety, that there is nothing in the print the sense of which is complete in itself without the manuscript addition. It is the intelligent filling up of the deed—the combination of the printed and manuscript words—which make sense of the deed, and all that is necessary to convert the printed form into a deed is in the handwriting of the granter. For these reasons I think it is very much to be desired that this convenient mode of making a simple will such as this is—a mode which appears to afford perfect security against fraud—should be recognised. I find nothing in writers of authority against the reception of such an instrument, and therefore, if the matter were to depend upon my opinion, I should hold this to be a good writing at common law, and not falling under the statutes regarding the authentication of deeds.

Lord Kinnear.—I agree with the majority of your Lordships. If this were a question of intention merely, there would be a great deal to be said in support of the will. But we are not looking at this instrument as a Court of construction for the purpose of ascertaining what the writer intended to effect. The preliminary question, with which alone we are concerned, is whether it satisfies the conditions prescribed by law for the authentication of written instruments. These conditions are prescribed by statutes, and if the statutes are applicable, the only question we have to consider is whether the statutory conditions have been fulfilled or not. But then it has been held from the earliest times, since the statutes regulating the authentication of written instruments were passed, that properly construed they do not apply to holograph writings, which mean, and can only mean, instruments written entirely by one hand, and that the hand of the subscriber. No doubt that definition requires to be enlarged by admitting that instruments may in certain cases be considered holograph, although they may contain other writing than that of the subscriber, but then that has been allowed only in cases in which those additional words which are not in the hand of the subscriber of the document are purely formal or superfluous, so that if they were struck out or disregarded, you would still have a complete expression of the writer's intention. It appears to me therefore that the question whether a document can receive effect as holograph is a mere question of fact; and I am unable to entertain any doubt that a document which is partly written and partly printed cannot by any possibility be holograph, if the printed parts are of any importance at all, because that contradicts the very definition of the word holograph. It is of no consequence whether those parts of a document which are not autograph of the subscriber are written by somebody else, or whether they are printed or lithographed. It is not holograph in the one case any more than in the other.

But a question has been raised which requires consideration, whether the Statute of 1681, which regulates the attestation of instruments that are not holograph, applies at all to instruments like that in question which are partly written and partly printed. Now, it would appear to me that if it did not, the conclusion would be that such an instrument ought to be sustained, not merely when important parts of it, or certain parts of it, are in the handwriting of the subscriber, but where the whole instrument is printed, provided it be subscribed, because upon that hypothesis there is no statutory solemnity applicable to such instruments. But I do not think it is necessary that we should consider the effect of the Act of 1681 upon that question as if it stood alone, because whether it applies to such instruments or not, it is at all events quite certain that the Act of 1868 applies to them, and that Act regulates in very clear and positive terms the conditions upon which such instruments are to receive effect. It provides that all documents may be partly written and partly printed, engraved, or lithographed, provided always that certain conditions are satisfied as to the character of the testing-clause. Now, that appears to me to be a statute which regulates the attestation of such a document as this, and I am unable to see any ground upon which we could refuse to apply that enactment, unless we were to hold that the document in question did not really fall within its terms, because it was not in a reasonable sense a document partly printed, but was in a reasonable sense holograph.

I entirely agree with the observations which your Lordship and Lord Adam have made with reference to cases of adoption, which do not appear to me to be applicable to this question at all.

THE COURT answered the question in the negative.

JOHN STURROCK, Pursuer (Respondent).—Sol.-Gen. Pearson—Craigie.
WELSH & FORBES, Defenders (Reclaimers).—Johnston—Salvesen.

Reparation—Wrongous use of diligence.—In an action of damages for wrongous use of diligence, the pursuer averred that in the course of an action of maills and duties raised against him by an investment company,—a heritable creditor,—for whom the defenders acted as law-agents, proposals had been made that the pursuer should grant trust-conveyances for behoof of his creditors of certain heritable subjects belonging to him, and that the defenders should in return deliver to the pursuer discharges by the investment company and by themselves of certain securities; that the defenders wrote to the pursuer, "upon exchange of these documents all personal claims against you at the instance of the investment company or ourselves shall be held as discharged"; that, in terms of this arrangement, the trust-deeds were delivered and became operative; that notwithstanding the arrangement the defenders, after taking decree in the action of maills and duties against the pursuer for £28, 10s. 7d. of expenses, had wrongfully executed a charge upon the decree.

The defenders maintained that the action was not relevant, in respect that it appeared from the pursuer's statement that he had after due notice allowed decree to go out against him in the action of maills and duties.

Held that the pursuer was entitled to an issue whether the defenders, having obtained a decree against the pursuer for £28, 10s. 7d., wrongfully and in breach of an agreement, the terms of which are contained in the letter, charged the pursuer to make payment of said sum.

1st Division. Ld. Kinnear. C.

THIS was an action of damages for wrongous use of diligence at the instance of John Sturrock, shorthand writer in Edinburgh, against Messrs Welsh & Forbes, S.S.C., and John Welsh and Roderick Forbes, the individual partners.

The pursuer made the following averments:—In and prior to 1886 the pursuer was proprietor of certain heritable properties in Edinburgh and Leith. The North British Property Investment Company, Limited, and the British Linen Company were postponed heritable creditors over certain of these properties. In November 1886, the Investment Company raised an action of maills and duties against him and the tenants in the properties in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh. The pursuer defended the action, and on 3d February 1887, the Sheriff-substitute pronounced decree against him, with expenses. He appealed to the Sheriff. While this appeal was pending negotiations took place between the pursuer and Welsh & Forbes, law-agents in Edinburgh, who acted on behalf of the Investment Company and the British Linen Company, as well as on their own behalf as creditors, which resulted in a proposal that the pursuer should grant two trust-conveyances, one conveying certain of his properties to Mr Richard Brown, C.A., as the nominee of the bank, and the other conveying certain others of his properties to Mr Davidson Smith, C.A., as the nominee of the investment company, upon condition of the pursuer getting an immediate discharge. These deeds were dated on or about 14th April 1887. At the time these trust-deeds were signed, Welsh & Forbes wrote to Sturrock a letter in the following terms:—"29 St Andrew Square, Edinburgh, 14th April 1887.—We hereby undertake, with reference to the trust-conveyances executed by you to-day in favour of Mr Richard Brown and Mr Davidson Smith, 1. that they shall not be binding upon you until they are formally acceded to by Messrs Burness, the British Linen Bank, the North British Property Investment Company, and ourselves; 2. that, when the deeds are so acceded to, we shall deliver to you discharges by the North British Property Investment Company and us of their and our securities over (1) your dwelling-house at Wardie, (2) the portion of the Marjoribanks superiority sold by you to Mr Byers, (3) discharge of the poinding and of the charge of payment upon our bond, and (4) discharge of arrestments in the action at our instance. Upon exchange of these documents all personal claims against you at the instance of the Investment Company or ourselves shall be held as discharged, and all claims at your instance against said company or against us shall also be held as discharged. The balance due to the Investment Company and to us has been left blank in the schedules attached to the trust-deeds in the meantime." The conditions mentioned in the letter were purified, and on 7th November 1887 the deeds, &c. in question were finally delivered, and the trust-deeds became operative.

(Cond. 4) "Notwithstanding the said letter of 14th April 1887, and the fact that the discharge contained in the same had then become absolute by the conditions being purified as above set forth, the defenders, towards the end of the year 1887, proceeded to have the pursuer's appeal to the Sheriff in the action of maills and duties dismissed, with expenses, and ultimately to take decree against the pursuer for £28, 10s. 7d., being the taxed amount of said expenses, in name of the defender Roderick Forbes, as alleged agent-disburser. The defenders were duly warned that the pursuer relied upon the letter of 14th April 1887 as discharging their claim for said expenses, and that any proceedings in respect of same would be at their own risk. A copy of the correspondence passing between the parties in reference thereto is produced and referred to."* (Cond. 5) "On 27th October 1888 the pursuer was, without any preliminary warning, most illegally and unjustly served with a charge upon said decree. The pursuer thereupon presented a note of suspension of said charge, and after certain procedure the Lord Ordinary (Wellwood), upon 12th June 1889, suspended the charge, with expenses, on the ground that said letter of 14th April 1887 operated as a universal discharge in favour of the pursuer of all personal claims at the instance of the said Investment Company and of the defenders, including the expenses found due by him in said action of maills and duties, and that after the date of the letter the pursuer had no further interest in said action." (Cond. 6) "The said charge was given by the defender Roderick Forbes on the instructions of, or as agent for, the said firm of Welsh & Forbes, to whom the account of expenses, but for the discharge which they had granted, would have been due. The said charge was wrongous, oppressive, and illegal, and the same has caused the pursuer serious loss and damage, and also great trouble and anxiety of mind. He has also incurred a large account to his agents for extrajudicial expenses in connection with the suspension of said charge."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The said charge being wrongous and illegal, the pursuer is entitled to damages as concluded for.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia, that the action was not relevant.

The Lord Ordinary (Kinnear), on 16th July 1890, allowed the following issue:—"(1) Whether the defenders, having on or about 16th December 1887 obtained a decree against the pursuer for the sum of £28, 10s. 7d., on or about 27th October 1888 wrongfully charged the pursuer to make payment of the sums contained in said decree, to his loss, injury, and damage? Damages laid at £500."

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The decree on which the charge proceeded was regularly obtained in an action of which the pursuer had due notice. The alleged discharge of 14th April 1887 ought to have been pleaded to the Sheriff, which had not been done. The pursuer was not entitled to lie by and allow decree in absence to be taken and then raise an action of damages upon the decree being executed.[1]

Argued for the respondent;—The pursuer could not have pleaded the discharge in the Sheriff Court to the effect of preventing decree. The defenders were entitled to decree for the purpose of constituting the debt against the trust-estate. But they had no right to enforce it against the

* Letter, Mr Sturrock to Mr Richard Brown, C.A.:—"5th Decr. 1887.—I enclose notice of enrolment in the action of maills and duties at the instance of the North British Property Investment Company against me. I understood that the trust-deed put an end to all preferences, and, if that is so, there is no occasion for further procedure in the case. However, as you are the party now interested, as coming in my place, I leave the matter for you to deal with as you may consider expedient."

Letter, Mr Sturrock to Mr Forbes:—"9th Decr. 1887.—I duly received your firm's notice of enrolment in this case, which I forwarded to Mr Richard Brown, the trustee. He returned it, but I did not get the notice back until after the case had been disposed of. I have also received your letter of this date, and relative account, which I am at a loss to understand. All personal claims at the instance of the Investment Co. and your firm were held as discharged, and that was one of the conditions of granting the deed. I shall be glad, therefore, if you will let me know, at your earliest possible convenience, what is the meaning of your letter, and what position you take up in the matter."

pursuer personally.[1] Judicial proceedings were privileged, but diligence was not, and for wrongous use of diligence the agent as well as the client was liable. The defenders could not here plead ignorance of the discharge, which might have excused them. The correspondence shewed that the pursuer had taken up this position from the first, and that the defenders were well aware of it.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—I agree with the Lord Ordinary in holding that the pursuer is entitled to an issue substantially in the terms proposed by him in the issue which is before us. But that issue, I think, will be made much more specific and much more intelligible to the jury if the wrong which is alleged against the defenders be specified more particularly. Therefore, I took leave to suggest during the debate that after the words "wrongfully charged" should be inserted the words "in breach of the agreement contained in the letter of 14th April 1887." And further, I agree with the suggestion by Mr Johnston in his reply, that the issue will be still further improved if the letter itself is set out in a schedule appended thereto, as the Judge and the jury will then have before them the ground upon which the charge is said to have been wrongfully made.

Under the issue as so adjusted there will arise at the trial a question of law as well as a question of fact. The question of law of course relates to the construction of the alleged agreement, and that is a matter upon which at present I express no opinion, as I suppose none of your Lordships intend to do. It will be for the presiding Judge to direct the jury in that respect. The question of fact raised upon the issue as so adjusted will turn mainly, I should think, upon whether the pursuer has in any way debarred himself from making his claim now in consequence of his not appearing in the Sheriff Court to oppose the decree being pronounced against him in the terms of which he had notice.

Upon a review of the correspondence which is in print between the defenders and the agents for the pursuer and the pursuer himself, I think the position taken by the pursuer was a perfectly reasonable one in the circumstances. The pursuer came to the conclusion that he could not very well oppose a decree going out against him in the action of maills and duties, because the action of maills and duties, as is usual in such cases, concluded against him as debtor for payment of the expenses of the process. The position the pursuer seems to have taken was this—that as he was very much in the same position as a sequestrated bankrupt, having surrendered all his estate to his creditors and put himself under trust, a decree taken out against him after the occurrence of that surrender in bankruptcy could be nothing more than a ground of claim for a ranking in the process of distribution which was to follow. I think that was quite a reasonable position for him to take in the circumstances, and it is not necessary to give any opinion at present as to whether it is absolutely correct in point of law. I cannot hold therefore that the pursuer neglected any proceeding that he ought to have taken before the Sheriff in that action of maills and duties. He might perhaps, if he had appeared, either have got the decree modified or reduced to a decree of constitution by inserting the words cognitionis causa tantum. That would have been substantially what he thought this decree would be, viz., a foundation for a ranking in the bankruptcy. But I do not think he did any injury to anyone by failing to appear, and I do not think he can be blamed in the circumstances for not going into Court and disputing the matter, which he must have done at his own cost, seeing that he was of opinion—and probably rightly of opinion—that the decree as it was actually issued was nothing more than a decree of constitution.

It seems to me, also, that the defenders themselves seem to have taken the same view of the subject originally, because after they obtained this decree they did not proceed to put it into execution as a decree against the pursuer personally. They delayed proceedings for about a year before taking any action under this decree. And at last when they did take action upon it the matter was raised—and I think quite competently raised—in a process of suspension before Lord Wellwood, in which the pursuer maintained that this decree could not be enforced against him personally, and that plea was sustained by the Lord Ordinary by an interlocutor which has now become final. His Lordship proceeded upon a construction of the agreement, and whether that construction turns out in the end to be sound or not—it at least put him in the position, consistently with his own opinion of the law and the circumstances of the case, of granting relief to the pursuer from anything in the nature of personal diligence upon this decree.

Now, that being so, it appears to me that the pursuer has a perfectly relevant case. What may become of it in the end is another affair, because that will depend upon what is the construction ultimately adopted of the agreement in question. But his case as stated upon record appears to me to be entirely relevant. He says that the charge given upon the decree against him was in breach of that agreement. If he can satisfy the jury upon that question he will be entitled to a verdict.

LORD ADAM.—In this case the defenders obtained a decree in the Sheriff Court against the pursuer, ordaining him to pay a sum of £28, 10s. 7d., being the amount of taxed expenses incurred in a process of maills and duties in that Court. About a year after the date on which this decree was obtained the defenders charged the pursuer to make payment of that sum. A suspension of that charge was then brought in this Court, which Lord Wellwood disposed of by granting suspension, and the present action is an action of damages brought against the pursuers in the Sheriff Court action for having executed the charge which has been suspended. The question accordingly is, whether or not the present pursuer is entitled to the issue he craves, and I agree with your Lordship that he is entitled to that issue.

I think, upon the authority of the case of Aitken v. Finlay, and the other cases that were quoted to us, that where a person has obtained a decree from a competent Court, and puts that decree into force by diligence and execution, he is not liable for damages thence arising, although it may afterwards turn out that there are grounds or reasons or objections which might have been urged against the decree being granted at all. I think a person having a good ground of objection to a decree going out against him is bound to appear at the proper time and place, and state that ground, and if he fails to do so the party putting the decree in force is not responsible. If I thought this was a case of that kind, I should be in favour of refusing the issue. But I do not think that is really the nature of this case.

Nov. 14, 1890. Sturrock v. Welsh & Forbes.

The question which arises here is, Whether the objections which are now stated to the enforcing of this decree are objections which the pursuer ought to have appeared and stated in the Sheriff Court before decree was granted? If he ought to have appeared and stated them, then an issue ought to be refused. That he might have appeared and stated them is one thing; that he ought to have appeared and stated them is another thing. If he had appeared and stated them his objection would have been that in accordance with an arrangement between him and his creditors the defenders in this action had discharged or agreed to discharge all personal claims against him, that this was one of them, and that therefore decree should not go out against him. But he might probably have been met with the answer that, although that was so, the defenders were entitled to have this claim constituted in order that they might rank upon it on his estate; and that being so, I have great difficulty in seeing why this decree should not have been granted in the terms in which it has been granted. I do not know whether that form prevails in the Sheriff Court or not, but they might, if they wished to be very careful, have asked the decree cognitionis causa tantum. But I hardly think that the pursuer ought necessarily to have gone forward and obtained this limitation. I think that after what had passed he was entitled to think that that decree would be treated as a decree of constitution, and I am not at all clear, the pursuer having made over all his estate for the benefit of his creditors, whether at this present moment it is anything more than a decree of constitution.

In these circumstances I am of opinion that the pursuer is not to blame for not having gone forward and objected to decree being granted in the terms in which it was granted. The ground accordingly upon which I think that this issue ought to be granted is that the objections now stated are truly objections to the decree being put in force, and not objections which ought to have been stated before the Sheriff.

Lord M'Laren.—I agree with your Lordship and Lord Adam. I consider that where a pursuer or a creditor has obtained decree for a sum to which he is not entitled, or for a larger sum than the debt to which he is entitled, he may notwithstanding proceed to enforce that decree, and no action of damages will lie at the instance of the defender if the defender was in a position to enter appearance in the original action, and successfully maintain the defence on which he has succeeded in having the decree suspended. Now, the question in this case is, Whether the grounds of suspension on which Lord Wellwood set aside the Sheriff's decision are such as might have been lawfully maintained by Mr Sturrock before the Sheriff when he received notice that the case would be enrolled for decree? That is a question of construction of the correspondence. It appears to me on the whole that both parties must have understood that the decree which the Sheriff was to be asked to pronounce was one in which Mr Sturrock had no personal interest. He says so himself plainly, and Messrs Welsh & Forbes say nothing to the contrary. I hold therefore that Mr Sturrock was not bound to appear before the Sheriff, and that he might reasonably assume that the decree to be taken was one which was not to be put in force against him, but was only for the purpose of constituting a claim for expenses against his estate, which he had made over for voluntary distribution. In these circumstances the question arises whether that decree has been wrongfully put into execution against the pursuer. The question whether it was wrongfully done is a matter for a jury. It is not to be assumed as clear that Mr Sturrock might not and ought not to have appeared before the Sheriff and objected to this decree being pronounced. However, that is a matter on which either party may justify his action to the jury.

Reparation—Promise to marry—Mora—Acquiescence.—In an action of damages raised in 1889 for breach of a promise to marry alleged to have been made in 1879, the defender admitted the promise, but pleaded that the pursuer's claim was barred by mora and acquiescence. It was proved before a jury that from 1881 till the raising of the action, the pursuer, though living in the same town as the defender, had hardly ever spoken to the defender, and when passing him in the street simply recognised him; but, in 1885, hearing that he was engaged to another woman (whom he married in 1889), she wrote to her intimating her prior engagement. The jury returned a verdict for the pursuer. On a motion for a new trial, the Court refused to disturb the verdict.

Observations on the plea of mora and acquiescence in cases of breach of promise of marriage.

1ST DIVISION. C.

IN January 1890, Elizabeth Colvin, daughter of the late John Colvin, farmer, Castlemains, near Sanquhar, brought an action of damages for breach of promise of marriage against William Johnstone, saddler, High Street, Sanquhar.

The pursuer averred that the defender had, in June 1879, promised to marry her; that the defender had never fulfilled that promise, but had married another woman in December 1889; (cond. 8) that from 1881 "the pursuer could not help noticing that defender's attitude towards her had changed. He did not seek her society or court her with his former ardour. He only spoke to her twice after his return, and on the latter of these occasions he demanded from her all the letters she had received from him, and when they met afterwards they simply recognised each other. This changed behaviour greatly distressed her, for no change had taken place in her feelings towards him. She was willing and anxious that he should implement his promise of marriage to her, but he never referred to the matter or gave any reason for the change in his behaviour. The engagement was never terminated between the parties." Cond. 9) ". . . The pursuer imagined that so long as the defender remained single she had no recourse against him for non-implement of his contract. While he was courting his present wife, she wrote her, intimating to her that the defender was trothed to her, and that the defender came to her and desired his engagement broken off and his letters returned or burned. She declined, and then intimated to him that if the letters were destroyed it would be after she had obtained redress."

The defender admitted that he had promised to marry the pursuer, and that he was now married to another woman. He stated that in January 1880 the pursuer had by letter declared the engagement at an end, and had agreed to destroy his letters to her, as he had agreed to destroy hers to him; and that, in 1885, on his finding out from a letter she had written to the lady whom he ultimately married that she had not destroyed his letters, he met her and she again promised to destroy them, admitting that the engagement was at an end.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The defender having promised to marry the pursuer as condescended on, and he having not implemented the said promise, is liable in damages.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The pursuer's claim is barred by mora and acquiescence. (2) The pursuer's averments are irrelevant, and insufficient to support the conclusions of the action. (3) Any engagement to marry having been cancelled by mutual agreement between the parties, and the pursuer having acquiesced in the engagement being broken off, the defender is entitled to absolvitor, with expenses.

The case was tried before Lord Trayner and a jury upon the following issue:—"Whether in or about the month of June 1879 the defender promised and engaged to marry the pursuer? and whether the defender wrongfully failed to implement his said promise and engagement, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?"

The following was the import of the evidence:—The marriage was originally fixed to take place in January 1880, but in October 1879 it was agreed to postpone it till July 1880. The pursuer deponed,—"In January 1880, the defender was in Sanquhar on a visit. I noticed then that he was changed. His manner shewed coldness, but I don't remember him asking me to release him from his engagement. . . . He came back to Sanquhar in 1881 to commence business as a saddler, which he has carried on ever since. After his return he never came to see me. When he met me he has spoken just in passing. I never asked the reason of his coolness, and he never gave any. I was anxious to marry him because I was still fond of him. . . . I never released the defender from his engagement. When he became engaged in 1885 I wrote to the lady telling her that I had not finished my engagement with defender. In consequence of that letter defender came to see me. He was angry about it. I did not then agree to break off his engagement, or to burn his letters, until I had done with them. . . . Cross-examined.—When defender came to me in 1885 about the letter I had written he asked me to burn his letters. I had not promised to burn them. I did not, that I remember, write to defender while he was at Port Ellen, saying I had burned his letters, and asking him to burn mine, but I may have done so. . . . I don't think I have ever asked the defender to marry me since 1885. Re-examined.—I have only spoken to the defender in passing since 1885."

The defender deponed;—"In 1881 I got a letter from pursuer asking me to destroy her letters, and saying that she had destroyed mine." He further deponed that at the interview in 1885 the pursuer had again promised to destroy the letters,—"I heard no more till the Saturday before I was married, when I got the pursuer's agent's letter. I thought I was free when I married."

The jury returned a verdict for the pursuer, damages £70.

The defender moved for a rule, on the ground that the verdict was against the evidence. Besides arguing that the evidence proved that the pursuer had expressly released him from his promise, the defender argued upon the plea of mora and acquiescence;—The whole conduct of the pursuer, as admitted by her on record and in her evidence, shewed that she had acquiesced in the engagement being at an end. It was impossible that a woman should continue to suppose herself to be engaged to a man when she was in the habit of passing him in the street with only the amount of recognition spoken to by the pursuer. But even if she had not acquiesced she must be held as barred by mora from now insisting in her claim. In the case of claims which required constitution mere delay to enforce the claim might be sufficient to support a plea of mora, although it was not alleged that there had been abandonment or acquiescence.[1] That peculiarly applied to a claim founded on a promise to marry, which could not reasonably be hung up for an indefinite time, and applied also to the facts here. If the pursuer intended to keep it alive in 1885 when she wrote the letter to the woman to whom the defender had become engaged, she was bound to follow it up by action. By not doing so she had lost whatever right she might previously have had.

The Court granted the rule.

The pursuer shewed cause. On the question of mora and acquiescence: The question was one of fact, and the jury had found for the pursuer. The evidence was such as to justify such a verdict.

At advising,—

LORD TRAYNER.—This is an action for breach of promise of marriage, the issue in which was tried before a jury and myself at the last sittings. The trial resulted in a verdict for the pursuer, the jury assessing the damages at £70. The defender has moved your Lordships for a rule on the pursuer to shew cause why a new trial should not be granted, and we have now heard the discussion upon that rule.

The state of the record is this:—The promise of marriage and the breach on the part of the defender by his having married another lady are admitted, but the defender maintains that the pursuer released him from his promise or engagement expressly upon two different occasions. He has a separate defence apart from the express release of the pursuer based upon the length of time which the pursuer has allowed to elapse before enforcing her claim. [His Lordship then considered the evidence bearing on the alleged express release, and came to the conclusion that no such release had been proved.]

The only other point in the case that remains then is the question whether the pursuer has lost any right to her remedy by her delay in bringing the action. I think that raises a question of very considerable delicacy. If a woman in the position of this pursuer intends to enforce an engagement of marriage I think she is bound to do so timeously. At all events, she is not entitled after a coolness has arisen, and all courting or communication has ceased, to let the defender go on for years under the impression that the matter is at an end. In such circumstances I think a pursuer is bound to make it plain to a defender that she holds him to his engagement. This case, however, presents a peculiarity which I think takes it out of any general rule of that kind. Although the coldness between these parties commenced in 1881, and action was not raised till 1890, yet during these nine years the defender was not without warning that the pursuer meant to insist upon her claim. In 1885, when the pursuer heard that the defender was courting another lady, she wrote to her intimating distinctly that she had a claim which she meant to insist on. And again, when she heard that the marriage was imminent, in the end of 1889, her agent wrote to the defender insisting on fulfilment of his engagement. If the pursuer had allowed the estrangement to proceed from 1881 to 1889 without any intimation of her intention to hold the defender to his engagement, I should have had no difficulty in holding that she had forfeited her claim to damages. But her intimations were made at those periods when she might be expected to make a claim if she intended to do so at all. The first time was when the defender was courting another lady. I think that was the first occasion on which she could possibly be held bound to intimate her claim. And then when the marriage became imminent she made a distinct protest against it, and gave intimation of her claim upon the defender by her lawyer's letter. I think it impossible to hold, looking to these two protests, that she acquiesced in the defender's conduct or abandoned her claim to damages. I therefore think the defence has failed, and I am of opinion the rule ought to be discharged.

LORD ADAM.—[After dealing with the first ground of defence]—The question remains whether the defender was discharged by mora and acquiescence. The delay which the defender relies on is the delay which took place between 1881, when he returned to Sanquhar, till 1889, when the action was raised, a delay of eight years. I do not think there is any law in this question. There is no prescription of marriage obligations or marriage promises. This question therefore must depend upon the acts of the parties during that time, and is therefore a question of fact. If I had been upon the jury I should have been disposed to have given a verdict the other way, but it is not the province of the Court thus to review the finding of the jury, and when I find that the jury, considering questions of fact, have come to a certain verdict, and that the Judge who tried the case agrees with the jury, I have come to the conclusion that this is not one of those extreme cases where we can upset the verdict.

LORD M'LAREN.—I understand your Lordships are all of opinion that the verdict should not be interfered with, but I am anxious, so far as my opinion is concerned, that we should not be supposed in the course we are taking to sanction the proposition that claims of this character may be indefinitely hung up, or that they may not be discharged by a lapse of time. As there is no period of prescription applicable to actions for breach of contract, it follows that these actions must be brought within a reasonable time. I think that in the absence of a settled period the law requires that the claim should be insisted in within a reasonable time. That time will depend on the nature of the action and the circumstances of the case. If that be so, I have no conception that a party may enlarge the time by merely intimating the claim without taking any active steps. Now, as the period between the breach and the raising of the action is a great deal longer than I should consider to be within the limits of a reasonable time, it would seem to follow that the verdict of the jury should not be supported. But my reason for concurring in the course suggested by Lord Trayner is this, that I think the case is not before us in such a shape that we can deal with the legal question. That question might have been brought before us in other ways. The defender might have objected to the case being sent to trial at all. I should have had sympathy with a motion to that effect. Next, he might have proposed to take a separate issue of implied discharge, and then the attention of the jury would have been specially directed to that as a definite point in the case.

Nov. 14, 1890.
Colvin v. Johnstone.

And again, the defender might have asked the Judge to give a specific direction to the jury, who would have clearly brought the point before them; and if the Judge did not give the direction the question might have come before us on a bill of exceptions. I am not satisfied that the jury in considering the case had clearly before them that this question of implied discharge was a separate point on which they might have found for the defender, even although they were of opinion that there was a breach of promise. But, of course, I must assume that the presiding Judge gave the necessary direction, as there is no exception.

In all the circumstances I think we must look upon this as a question of fact from the manner in which it has come before us, though I cannot help feeling that the result at which the jury have arrived is neither consistent with good sense nor with the justice of the case.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with Lord Adam. I think the question between the parties in this case is a question of fact which appears to me to be sufficiently raised by the issue sent to the jury. The question in the issue was, whether the defender had wrongfully failed to perform his promise, and as the promise was admitted and the non-performance was admitted, I agree with Lord Adam that the defender had to satisfy the jury that the breach was not wrongful. But upon the question of fact I must say that, judging of the evidence for myself, I should not have been able to reach the conclusion at which the jury arrived. But, then, I think it was a proper question for the jury. I do not think it can be said that their verdict cannot be justified by any reasonable view of the evidence, and since their verdict has been given upon a question which was proper for them, and since it has the approval of the Judge who tried the case, I agree with Lord Adam that we ought not to disturb it.

LORD PRESIDENT.—There is no doubt that the defender promised to marry the pursuer in 1879, and that in the year 1889 he married another woman. That, however, is not in the least degree conclusive, because he might be perfectly able to justify his conduct notwithstanding these two facts. Accordingly, the issue sent to the jury was, whether in disabling himself from fulfilling his promise he acted wrongfully. It was of course for the pursuer to shew that he did act wrongfully; and, on the other hand, it was for the defender to shew that there were circumstances to justify his conduct. It appears to me that there are nothing but questions of fact raised by the issue, and therefore one must be very slow in disturbing the unanimous verdict of the jury in favour of the pursuer, a verdict which has the entire approval of the Judge who tried the cause. The result of my consideration of the case is in entire accordance with the views expressed by Lord Adam and Lord Kinnear.

THE COURT discharged the rule.

English form, in which he declared that his domicile was in England. He died in September 1889, and his executor obtained probate. The testator's only child having presented a petition in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire to have it found that the testator died domiciled in Scotland, and obtained interim interdict against the executor distributing the funds without providing for payment of legitim, the executor on 16th December 1889 obtained from the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice in England an order that, inter alia, an inquiry should be made whether the testator was domiciled in England, and appointing a receiver to collect the estate.

On 23d December 1889 the testator's daughter raised an action in the Court of Session, concluding for declarator that the testator was domiciled in Scotland, and that she was entitled to legitim.

The Court, in respect that the question of domicile was before the Court in England, dismissed the action.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Trayner. M.

IN 1874 Thomas Buchanan, a Scotsman, who had formerly been in business in Glasgow went to reside in Manchester, where he acted as agent for the firm of John Buchanan & Brothers, wholesale confectioners, Glasgow, till his death.

On 14th May 1889 he executed a will in the English form, in which he stated,—"I have, as will be observed, omitted to leave my daughter Jane any legacy, share of residue, or other interest under this my will. This I have done purposely, as it is my intention and wish that she shall not receive any benefit under the same. And I declare that my domicile is in England, and that I have no intention of abandoning such domicile."

Mr Buchanan died on 22d September 1889, when on a visit to one of his brothers in Glasgow.

The executors named in the will were his brother, Robert Buchanan, and his nephew, Andrew Buchanan. Robert Buchanan, being the only executor of full age, obtained probate in England and raised an administrative suit in England.

On 2d December 1889 Mrs Jane Forsyth Buchanan or Ferguson, the testator's only child, presented a petition in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire against her father's executors, in which she prayed the Court to find that the testator was at the time of his death domiciled in Scotland, and to ordain the defenders to lodge an inventory in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire, and to prohibit the executors from distributing the estate on the footing that the testator was domiciled in England, and without providing for the petitioner's claim for legitim, and meantime to grant interim interdict. Interim interdict was granted.

The executor then made an application to the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice in England, on which Mr Justice Chitty, on 16th December 1889, made the following order,—"It is ordered that the following accounts and inquiries be taken and made, that is to say, 1. An account of the personal estate not specifically bequeathed, of Thomas Buchanan deceased, the said testator, come to the hands of the plaintiff, Robert Buchanan, the acting executor of his will, or to the hands of any other person or persons by or for the order or use of the said plaintiff. . . . 6. An inquiry whether the testator was, at the time of his decease, domiciled in England, and if it shall be found that the testator was not domiciled in England, where was his domicile. And, in the event of its being found that the testator was domiciled in Scotland—7. An inquiry whether the personal estate of the testator is subject to payment of any and what portion thereof to any child or children of the testator living at his death, notwithstanding the provisions of his said will. . . . The Judge doth hereby appoint Bentley James Bridgewater, auctioneer, to receive, collect, and get in the personal estate of the said testator. And it is ordered that the plaintiff, Robert Buchanan, the executor of the testator's will, do deliver over to the said Bentley James Bridgewater, as such receiver, all securities in his hands for such personal estate, together with all books and papers relating thereto."

On 23d December 1889 Mrs Ferguson, with consent of her husband, raised an action in the Court of Session against Robert Buchanan, the executors and the beneficiaries under the will, for declarator that her father was at the date of his death domiciled in Scotland, and that the pursuer as his only child was entitled to legitim out of his estate. The pursuer further concluded for interdict against the defenders, as executors, withdrawing the estate of Buchanan furth of Scotland, and beyond the jurisdiction and control of the Courts of Scotland, and from rendering an account thereof to the High Court of Justice in England, or of any tribunal other than the Courts of Scotland, till the pursuer's claim upon the estate should be satisfied. The summons as originally laid contained conclusions for reduction of the settlement left by the pursuer's father, but these conclusions were subsequently abandoned.

The defenders denied that the pursuer's father died domiciled in Scotland, and averred that he was domiciled in England at his death.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) Forum non conveniens. (2) Lis alibi pendens. (4) The testator having died domiciled in England, the pursuer is not entitled to legitim.

The Lord Ordinary (Trayner), on 5th November 1890, repelled the first and second pleas in law for the defenders, and allowed the parties a proof of their respective averments as to the domicile of the late Thomas Buchanan.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—England was the convenient forum. The will was in English form, and the deceased had been long resident in England. An inquiry was commenced in the Court of Chancery before this action was brought. The pursuer was called to that action, and could appear there and establish, if she had evidence to shew it, that the deceased died domiciled in Scotland. This second process in Scotland was therefore unnecessary, and ought to be dismissed. The proceedings before the Sheriff did not make any difference.

The pursuer argued;—The admitted facts of the case shewed a Scots domicile, or at least a case into which the Courts of Scotland should inquire. The pursuer had taken proceedings in the Sheriff Court before the Chancery proceedings were instituted. The defenders were attempting by means of the English proceedings to avoid having the question decided in the appropriate Court. There was nothing in the English proceedings to interfere with the action.[1]

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It appears that before this action was raised proceedings had been taken in the Court of Chancery to have the estate of the deceased Mr Buchanan administered under the direction of that Court. The action, as originally laid, was for reduction of a will executed shortly before Mr Buchanan died, as well as for declarator that he died domiciled in Scotland, and that the pursuer was entitled to legitim. But the latter conclusions alone now remain, since the pursuer discovered the existence of another will, which would not be open to objection, and which would regulate the disposal of the estate, in the event of her success in the reduction of the last will. She therefore abandoned her reductive conclusions.

In the proceedings in England the Judge of the Court of Chancery has appointed a receiver, and he has also directed an inquiry to be made as to whether the deceased died domiciled in England, and if not, in what country his domicile was. In the face of that judgment, we are asked to proceed with this action, which, as I have said, was raised subsequently to the commencement of the English Chancery suit. That, so far from being a convenient, would be a very inconvenient course. I think we should do nothing to interfere with the proceedings in the Court of Chancery. The pursuer will have an opportunity before that Court of raising every question of domicile which she desires to raise in this action.

It only remains to be considered whether the proper course be to sist this action till the result of that depending in the Court of Chancery be made apparent, or to dismiss it altogether. I think that the proper course is to dismiss it. It will of course remain open to the pursuer to raise any competent action which may yet be required. But the proper course now is to dismiss this action.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. The estate in question is that of a man who originally belonged, we are told, to Scotland, but went to Manchester in 1874, and resided there till his death in September 1889. He died leaving a will in English form. His estate appears to consist for the most part of a sum at his credit in the books of a business in Glasgow of which he was a partner. In December an administration suit was raised in Chancery, and a receiver was appointed on his estate, and on 16th December the Court of Chancery made an order directing inquiry as to his domicile. On 23d December, just a week later than that order, this action was brought. It is now, by the abandonment of the reductive conclusions, reduced to being an action of declarator as to domicile only, and I think that, considering the standing order of the Court of Chancery, it is not fitting for us to entertain it. I cannot doubt the competency of the English suit. It appears to me to constitute no interference with the proper jurisdiction of the Scottish Court, and to be prima facie competent and proper. I think it would, in these circumstances, be improper that we should entertain this action, and I therefore agree with your Lordship that it should be dismissed.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and dismissed the action.

WILLIAM MUNRO, writer and banker, Dunoon, died on 27th September 1889, survived by his wife, Mrs Janet Dawson or Munro, to whom he was married on 17th June 1885, and three children, of whom the eldest was a daughter. He was also survived by his parents, Mr William Munro senior and Mrs Janet M'Rostie or Munro, and by a nephew, Alexander John Munro Bennett.

The deceased left a holograph will, dated 5th February 1884, by which he made over "my whole means and estate, heritable and moveable, to my parents should they survive me, failing them to my nephew," but under burden, inter alia, of two sums of £100 to be paid to the ministers and sessions of, respectively, the United Presbyterian Church, Dunoon, and the United Presbyterian Church at Alva.

This holograph settlement was found in the repositories of the deceased, put up together with certain jottings or memoranda holograph of the deceased, and shewing the state of his affairs as at 31st December in each of the years 1883 to 1887. The holograph settlement, which was written in ink, had the following pencil alterations made thereon:—The word "parents" was deleted, and the word "wife" was written below it; the word "they," occurring in the same line, was deleted, and the word "she" was written in between it and the next word "survive." The word "nephew" was deleted, and the word "daughter" was written below it. The alterations were in the handwriting of the deceased. They had been made in pencil only, were not initialed or signed, and no date was attached to them.

The deceased had, on 16th June 1885, executed an antenuptial contract of marriage in favour of trustees, in which he settled £2000, part of his estate, upon his wife and children in full satisfaction of jus relictæ, legitim, and all other claims against his estate.

Mr Munro left personal estate amounting to £7246, 17s. 8d., and also heritable properties, subject to a bond of £700, the gross rental of which was £218.

By trust-disposition, dated 7th November 1889, Mr Munro's parents, with consent of his nephew, assigned their rights under his will to trustees for behoof of his widow and children, subject to an annual payment of £40 which their son had been in use to pay them.

Questions having arisen in regard to the succession to Mr Munro's means and estate, a special case was presented to the Court by (1) Mr Munro's executors; (2) by the trustees acting under his parents' trust-deed; (3) by his widow; (4) by the ministers and sessions of the United Presbyterian Churches at Dunoon and Alva; (5) by the tutors and curators to the pupil children.

The questions for the opinion of the Court were as follows:—"(1) Is the said holograph settlement effectual as a will in favour of Mr Munro's parents, under burden of payment of the debts and legacies therein mentioned? (2) Is the said holograph settlement, in respect of the pencil alterations made thereon by Mr Munro, effectual as a will in favour of the third party, under burden of the payment of the debts and legacies therein mentioned? (3) Does the said holograph settlement effectually bequeath to the minister and session of the United Presbyterian Church, Dunoon, a legacy of £100 for the purposes therein mentioned, and does it effectually bequeath to the minister and session of the United Presbyterian Church at Alva a legacy of £100 for the like purposes? (4) Was the said holograph settlement revoked by the subsequent birth of children to Mr Munro by the operation of the conditio si testator sine liberis decesserit, and does the whole of his means and estate, subject to the obligations undertaken by him in the said antenuptial contract of marriage, belong exclusively to his three children as his heirs ab intestato?"

Argued for the first and second parties;—(1) The unauthenticated pencil alterations and additions to Mr Munro's holograph deed must be taken to be merely deliberative.[1] (2) That being so, the deed must be taken as a will in favour of the parents, unless it was revoked by the operation of the conditio si testator sine liberis decesserit. This condition however was a mere presumption, founded on the pietas paterna, and yielded to facts and circumstances from which the testator's intention to retain his will unaltered could be inferred.[2] There were such facts and circumstances here. (a) The will did not, when it came to be carried out, deal with the testator's whole estate. The marriage-contract dealing with a part was effectual.[3] (b) The testator lived a "competent" time after the birth of a child. (c) After the birth of the eldest child he had his will in view. The pencil alterations shewed that he had contemplated an alteration of it in favour of his wife.

The third party adopted the argument of the second parties with regard to the alleged revocation by the operation of the conditio. On the effect of the pencil alterations she maintained that these ought to receive effect. A settlement altogether in pencil was valid.[4] This was a rough holograph will, which might quite well be in pencil. The explanation of Lamont v. Magistrates of Glasgow,[5] and that class of cases, was that in them the question was whether a formal trust-deed was to be regarded as in part revoked by pencil jottings made upon it by the granter after he had taken it away with him for consideration as to how he should alter it. The presumption was that such jottings were deliberative only.

Argued for the fifth parties;—The conditio came into operation upon the birth of a child to the testator. Its effect was absolutely to revoke the will. No doubt in the earlier cases, such as Colquhoun v. Campbell,[6] there were dicta to the effect that if the testator survived the birth of a child for a sufficiently long time, the presumption arising from the conditio might be rebutted and the will might revive. There was however no reported case to this effect, no indication of opinion as to what length of time it was necessary for the testator to survive his child, and it was difficult to see how in any circumstances such a conclusion could be reached. It would involve an inquiry into the circumstances and intention of the testator, in which parole evidence would be led to determine the validity or non-validity of his will. It had been said in Colquhoun's[7] case that in order to overcome the presumption the facts must be "as plain as a pikestaff" that the testator intended the succession not to go to the children subsequently born. In short, the only view consistent with legal principle was to hold the will absolutely voided by the conditio.[1] That being so, the result was intestacy, as a revoked deed could not be made a new will by mere pencil alterations unsigned by the testator.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The late Mr William Munro, banker in Dunoon, on the 5th of February 1884, wrote out and signed a holograph will. He was then a bachelor, and he left the bulk of his property "to his parents" and failing them to his "nephew," under the burden of the payment of certain legacies.

Mr Munro afterwards married, and at some time unknown after his marriage he took this will and with a pencil scored out the word "parents" and inserted in its stead the word "wife," and also scored out the word "nephew" and inserted instead the word "daughter." That must certainly have been done after his first child had been born, and before any of the other children had been born, for he would not otherwise have written "to my wife should she survive me and failing her to my daughter." But that is of little consequence.

The question before us is whether this will shall stand as it is, or whether it shall stand as it was originally written, or whether it is invalid. These are practically the questions which we have to dispose of in the present case. Now, I think it is clear that this will as it originally stood came to an end by the fact of Mr Munro having married and having had a family, and having left a family, and that the doctrine si testator sine liberis decesserit applies. The will came to an end as a will in favour of the parents and nephew.

The next question is whether there being no valid original will at all, his taking this will and making these alterations on it in pencil constituted a new will. I am of opinion that it did not. It is not necessary to enter into questions which may be raised as to what may be done by pencil alterations. But finding a document of this kind with part of it cancelled and filled in in pencil and part of it left standing, the only conclusion I think one can come to is, that Mr Munro, knowing the law, for he was a writer and notary-public as well as a banker, was using it as the draft of a new will which he intended to make. He was going to alter his will. It is hardly to be supposed that he intended this original will, with the alterations on it, to be his last will, but rather that he intended to use it as the draft of a will giving new directions for the disposal of his affairs, and therefore I am of opinion that it did not constitute a new will. That being so, the estate must be dealt with according to the ordinary rules of law. The result is that the questions put in this case must be answered the first three in the negative and the last in the affirmative.

LORD YOUNG and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Answer the first, second, and third questions in the negative, and the fourth in the affirmative: Find and declare accordingly."

EARL OF WEMYSS AND MARCH AND OTHERS, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—Sol.-Gen. Pearson—Ure.

EARL OF ZETLAND AND OTHERS, Defenders (Respondents).—Jameson—C. J. Guthrie.

Salmon-fishing—Fixed engine—Net.—A net of from 120 to 300 yards long and from 10 to 15 feet deep, made of very fine twine, with a light head-rope and cork floats along its upper edge, and a heavier rope along its lower edge, was used for catching salmon in the River Tay. The mode of using it was, shortly before high and low water of every tide, to row a boat across the stream, and to pay out one end of the net. When the net was all paid out it was cast completely adrift from the boat, and it remained in its position across the stream during the short period when the tide began to slacken, either at the ebb of high tide or at the first of the tide. The fish were caught by being entangled in the meshes of the net, and were immediately drawn up into the boat. As soon as the current began to get stronger from above or below, the net began to gradually assume a zigzag shape, and was then hauled into the boat.

Held (following Masters of Allan's Mortification v. Thomson, Nov. 14, 1879, 7 R. 221) that the net so used was not a "fixed engine," and that the mode of fishing was not illegal.

2D DIVISION. Lord Trayner. M.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS AND MARCH and others were proprietors of salmon-fishings on the River Tay and the River Earn, situated partly above and partly opposite to the fishings belonging to the Earl of Zetland, which extended for six miles on the south bank of the Tay near Newburgh. They brought an action against the Earl of Zetland and George Dunn and George Macvean, his tenants in his salmon-fishings, to have it found and declared that the defenders were "not entitled by themselves, or by others acting with their authority and consent, to fish in any part of the river or estuary of the Tay for salmon, or fish of the salmon kind, with nets of the description known as hang-nets or drift-nets." The summons contained further conclusions for interdict against their fishing with these nets, as they had been doing for several seasons.

The pursuers, after setting forth the particular mode of fishing which they alleged the defenders were practising, averred, inter alia, that during the time the nets were in the water they remained "stretched across the current of the stream, and they are used for the double purpose of taking fish and of keeping back fish not so taken, that they may be taken by the draught-nets that are used as soon as the turn of the tide makes such fishing available." The pursuers further averred that the nets seriously obstructed the free passage of the salmon up the river, were "illegal at common law, and contrary to the provisions of various Acts of the Parliament of Scotland," and that the portions of the river where the defenders fished were perfectly suited for net and coble fishing in the ordinary way.

It was admitted in the defences that the defenders Macvean and Dunn used drift-nets or hang-nets. The defenders founded on Masters of Allan's Mortification v. Thomson, 7 R. 221, the judgment in which, they averred, affirmed the legality of using precisely similar nets in the River Forth.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The said nets used or permitted to be used by the defenders as aforesaid, being substantially fixed engines adapted for the capture and obstruction of salmon and fish of the salmon kind, are illegal both at common law and under the statutes above libelled. (2) The said nets used by the defenders as aforesaid being illegal, and in violation of the rights of the pursuers as upper proprietors on the said river, the pursuers are entitled to declarator and interdict as libelled.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The defenders should be assoilzied, in respect that the said nets are neither fixed engines nor illegal obstructions to the passage of salmon. (2) The method of fishing complained of being merely a form of fishing by net and coble adapted to the character of the part of the river in question, the defenders should be assoilzied, with expenses.

On 28th June 1889 the Lord Ordinary (Trayner) assoilzied the defenders.*

The pursuers reclaimed, and on 21st January 1890 the Second Division recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and remitted the cause to him, with instructions to allow the parties a proof of their averments.

Proof was led, and the following summary sets forth the mode of fishing practised by the defenders:—The nets used by the defenders were from 120 to 300 yards long, and from 10 to 15 feet in depth. They were made of very fine twine, and the meshes were from 2½ to 3 inches wide from knot to knot—that is, from 10 to 12 inches round. A light head-rope ran along the whole length of the top of the net, to which were attached cork floats at intervals of about 3 feet, and a similar though heavier rope was run along the bottom of the net. The purpose of these floats and of the latter rope was to keep the net in an upright position in the water, and to keep the upper side of the net always on the surface. In fishing with the nets, the practice was to begin fishing shortly before high or low water of every tide, when it began to slacken at the ebb of high water, or at the first of the tide. The boat with the net in it was rowed out into the stream. One end of the net, which might be called the far end, was then begun to be paid out into the channel where the fish were wont to run, and in water deeper than the depth of the nets, and at a distance from the side sufficient to secure such a depth of water as would keep the net from coming in contact with the bed of the river. When it was all paid out, the net was cast adrift, there being no connection between it and the boat, except when the fishing was conducted at night, when a small cord was attached to the net in order to prevent its being lost in the dark. The net was then in fishing position, and remained in its position straight across the channel for a short period, during which the water remained slack. When the floats indicated that a fish was entangled in the net, the boat left its position, and was rowed along the line of the net, and the fish was then taken out. As soon as the current from

* "OPINION.—The defenders maintain that the mode of fishing complained of in this action has already been determined to be a legal mode, and that therefore they should be assoilzied. They refer to the decision in the case of Masters of Allan's Mortification, 7 R. 221. The pursuers say that that case can be distinguished from the present in two particulars. (1) They aver in this case that the net 'remains stretched across the stream,' while in Allan's case it was admitted that the free or river end of the net was swept down by the action of the tide, until it became parallel with the shore, which was just a slow sweep of the net. And (2), that in Allan's case it was admitted that net and coble was not a suitable mode of fishing the water there in question, while in the present case net and coble is not only suitable, but is practised. I do not think this case is distinguishable from Allan's case. It is obvious that the free end of the net complained of, unless fixed, which it is not said to be, must fall off towards the shore under the action of the tide, and cannot remain stretched across the river. The character of the net and mode of fishing in each case is the same. The net is never fixed or stationary while being used; it is always moving or drifting more or less.

"With regard to the second point, I agree with the opinion of Lord Shand in Allan's case. The legality or illegality of a certain mode of fishing is not to be determined by the consideration whether another mode of fishing is suitable or not."

above or below grew stronger, it acted upon the net, which began to gradually assume a zigzag shape, bulging in the centre, and assuming the shape of the letter "S," and the net was then hauled into the boat. The net was in the water, from the time it was "shot," twenty minutes to three quarters of an hour, and during that period it drifted about 100 yards. It was further proved that at some of the places near Newburgh where the nets were thus used fishing by net and coble was possible, and had in fact been in former days practised.

The pursuers sought to shew that the hang-nets formed a complete obstruction to the salmon, while the defenders sought to shew that the fish were in the habit of going under, round, and over the nets.

On 23d May 1890, the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel for the parties on the evidence adduced . . . assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the action, and decerns."*

Argued for the pursuers;—It was proved that the nets were during the slack of the tide at high and low water stretched across the channel of the river in the run of the salmon as a complete barrier to their passage up the river. The nets in point of fact were for a period which might be stated as from five to ten minutes absolutely motionless relative to the water, and almost motionless relative to the land. They were therefore illegal.[1] The present case differed from the case of Allan's Mortification, relied upon by the defenders, in two important particulars. (1) In the Forth case, the opinion of Lord Deas[2] proceeded largely upon the fact that fishing by net and coble was not feasible, while in the present case, it was proved that such a mode of fishing was suitable and was practised. (2) In the Forth case, where the mode of fishing was carefully scrutinised, it appeared to be neither more nor less than net and coble fishing, but with a longer interval than usual between the successive "shots." In the present case there was nothing in the nature of a series of "shots." The whole time the net was actually being fished it formed a fence across the river, and was as permanent an obstruction to salmon as a loose net could be. The mode of fishing was then of that objectionable nature figured by Lord Westbury in the Bermoney boat case.[3] Indeed, it differed very little from the kind of hang-net fishing which was expressly interdicted by the Court in Dirom v. Littles.[4] Though it appeared from the report that one end of the net was in the latter case made fast, it also appeared that the other end was loose, and that the net was drawn diagonally across the channel. In any view, having regard to Lord Westbury's opinion above referred to, as well as to the dictum of the Lord Justice-Clerk (Hope) in Ramsay's case, the case of Allan's Mortification fell to be reconsidered.

Argued for the defenders;—This case was ruled by Allan's Mortification. Indeed, that case was really a stronger one in point of obstruction to salmon than the present. In it it was admitted that the boat moved with the net for the very purpose of keeping it straight across the run of

* "OPINION.—I am unable to find any material distinction whatever between the nets complained of in this action, and the manner in which they are used, and the nets the use of which was held in the case of Allan's Mortification to be legal. I think that case is decisive of the present, and I therefore, following that decision, assoilzied the defenders with expenses. I concur in the opinion delivered by Lord Shand in the case I have referred to."

the salmon, and that for a period of from one to two hours. Here nothing was done to keep the net straight, and soon after it was "shot" it began to zigzag and lose its straight position. Further, in the Forth case it was maintained that the fact that the net was fixed to the boat by a rope constituted it a fixed engine as in Dirom's case. Here, except at night, the net was not attached to the boat at all. The notion that where a net was said to be motionless or stationary relative to the water, it must therefore be said to be a fixed obstruction, was erroneous. A fixed obstruction could only be constituted by something fixed to the solum of the shore or to the channel of the river.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is an action to have it found and declared that the defenders are not entitled to fish in any part of the River Tay for salmon or fish of the salmon kind with nets of the description known as "hang-nets" or "drift-nets," and for interdict against the use of such nets.

Now, the Lord Ordinary, having considered the case on the record, decided that there was no distinction between this case and the case of Allan's Mortification, and therefore he assoilzied the defenders from the conclusions of the action. In this Court we thought, on reviewing that interlocutor, that it would be advisable to have the matter in dispute cleared up by a proof, and that proof is before us.

Now, the conclusions of the present action are practically to the same effect as the conclusions in the case of Allan's Mortification. They are directed against placing drift-nets in the water. Is there any difference in the facts as now ascertained which shall make it necessary to hold that the use of such nets in this particular case is illegal?

In Allan's case the drift-nets were used, so far as I can see, practically in the same manner as they are used in this case, and this remark applies both to the nets themselves and to the mode in which the fish were captured. If there is any distinction it is one which does not arise from the mode of fishing or the way in which the appliance is used, but from the fact that the stream is in this case somewhat different in strength and action from the stream in Allan's case. It seems to me, however, that if we take the opinion delivered by Lord Westbury in Hay v. Magistrates of Perth and apply it to this case, we shall find that what was done here was in no way in contradiction to what were laid down by his Lordship as being the essential elements of fair river fishing, of which the symbols are net and coble. His Lordship says (4 Macq. App. 546), —"The proper conclusion is that the 'net and coble' is merely symbolical of the proper legal form of fishing, that legal form of fishing being by a net which is not to be fixed or stented, or in any manner settled or made permanent in the river, but is to be used by the hand, and is not to quit the hand, but is to be kept in motion during the operation of fishing."

Now, in Allan's case it is certain that the way in which the net was kept in motion was by the action of the tide or of the stream on the net. In this case also there is no doubt that the motion imparted to the net is imparted by the water, and by the water alone. I suppose that a net of this kind stretched in absolutely still water would be ineffectual, and though the stream and tide may cause the net not to swing round in exactly the same way as it did in Allan's case, still the effect of the tide and stream is to keep the net moving always, and to prevent its remaining in one fixed place across the river.

Earl of Wemyss v. Earl of Zetland.

These then being the facts, I am unable to see any distinction between this case and Allan's case. If the question were still open it might be a difficult one to decide, and I cannot say that my opinion would not lean in the direction of the decision in that case, because I think it was consistent with the deliverance of Lord Westbury which I have quoted. But I think it is sufficient for us in the decision of this case to find that there is no substantial difference of any kind between the facts of the two cases, and on that ground to hold that we must adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD YOUNG.—I concur in adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. I only wish to say this, that I do so solely because of the judgment in the case of Allan's Mortification. I am not prepared to say with the Lord Ordinary that I agree with the opinion delivered by Lord Shand in that case. I think the decision is not free from doubt, and I should have been very glad if your Lordships had seen fit to reconsider the subject of it in this case very carefully. I only therefore wish to guard myself against our decision being thought—if any future case should arise and go elsewhere, or this case go elsewhere—against it being thought that we are adding by our present judgment to the authority and weight of the case of Allan. I think we proceed—at least I do—on it entirely because it would not seem to your Lordships on the whole to be fitting for us to review that decision in the present case. I should like to say that I do not approve of any judgment of any Division as conclusive of Scots law. If it should happen to be thought wrong on further consideration either by the same Division or another Division, I am not of opinion that it is necessary to summon the whole Court, or that nothing but an Act of Parliament will correct an error that has been fallen into. The series rerum judicatarum would cease to be valuable if as soon as a judgment was pronounced the matter was to be considered as conclusively settled; and it is a matter of discretion in the circumstances whether in considering a point which has been a subject of decision either by ourselves or by the other Division we should call in a larger number of Judges to consider it or not. But here, clearly guarding against being supposed to add anything to the weight of that decision by our formal adherence, or that we are doing more than simply adhering, I concur in the Lord Ordinary's judgment being affirmed.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am of the same opinion, and think that we should adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. I only wish to say further that I proceed solely upon the case of Allan's Mortification, and that like Lord Young I do not think that case is entirely free from doubt.

THE COURT adhered.

December 1888, and on 5th March 1889, the cashier of Ramsay Brothers had collected two accounts due to MacLay & Co. by a customer for £5, 5s. and £4, 4s. respectively, and that these sums had been credited to MacLay & Co.; that Ramsay Brothers had been sequestrated on 6th May 1889; that on 20th February 1890 the defenders had written to the pursuer—"We are surprised at having had no reply to ours of the 3d inst., regarding the a/cs of Wilson, Saline, which you collected and have not accounted for. It seems to us you do not realise the seriousness of your position in the matter, but should we be forced to insist on Mrs Wilson paying us the accounts she has already paid to you, and which is quite within our right, as she holds no receipt from us, and those she had from you are no legal discharge of a/cs due to MacLay & Co., she threatens to place the affair in the hands of her law-agent, and you may then find yourself in an awkward situation, as he will in all probability report to the fiscal. If you wish to save yourself from unpleasant consequences you will let us hear from you without delay"; that by this letter the defenders had falsely, calumniously, and maliciously represented that the pursuer, without any authority from MacLay & Company, had collected money due by a customer to them, and had dishonestly appropriated the same, or part thereof, to his own purposes, and been guilty of breach of trust and embezzlement.

The pursuer did not deny on record the liability of his firm to account, or their failure to do so, and, although allowed delay in order to explain what had become of the money, intimated that he had no explanation to give.

The Court held (1) that the pursuer was entitled to an issue, and (2) that the word "maliciously" should not be inserted in the issue (diss. Lord Young upon both points).

2D DIVISION. Lord Kinnear. M.

THIS was an action of damages for slander raised by Robert Ramsay, a partner of the firm of Ramsay Brothers, bottlers, Dunfermline, of which he and his brother John were the sole partners prior to the sequestration of the firm on 6th May 1889, against MacLay & Co., brewers, Alloa.

The pursuer made the following averments:—The pursuer and his brother John were sole partners of the firm of MacLay & Co. until November 1888, when Alexander Fraser and James Drummond joined the firm. While the pursuer and his said brother carried on business under the name of the said two firms, the firm of Ramsay Brothers acted as agents in Dunfermline and the surrounding districts for MacLay & Company, obtaining orders and receiving and discharging accounts in their name for that firm. After Mr Fraser and Mr Drummond were assumed partners that practice continued.

In April 1889 Fraser and Drummond agreed to buy up the interests of the pursuer and his brother in the firm of MacLay & Co., and in October 1889 a final settlement was made by certain payments to the pursuer and his brother.

On 28th December 1888 an account amounting to £5, 5s. by Mrs Wilson, Saline, to MacLay & Co. was collected by the cashier for Ramsay Brothers, and another account due by her to the same firm for £4, 4s. was collected by him on 5th March 1889.

(Cond. 3) "The defenders, on or about 20th February 1890, maliciously, and without probable cause, or any cause, wrote or caused to be written and delivered to the pursuer a letter in the following terms:—'Mr Robert Ramsay, Dunfermline.—Dear Sir,—We are surprised at having had no reply to ours of the 3d inst., regarding the a/cs of Wilson, Saline, which you collected and have not accounted for. agent, and you may then find yourself in an awkward situation, as he will in all probability report to the fiscal. If you wish to save yourself from unpleasant consequences you will let us hear from you without delay." (Cond. 4) "The said letter is of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely, calumniously, and maliciously represented that the pursuer, without any authority from MacLay & Company, had collected money due by a customer to them, and had dishonestly appropriated the same, or part thereof, to his own purposes, and been guilty of breach of trust and embezzlement. . . . When the defenders wrote the said letter they had in their possession the receipts which had been granted by the cashier of the pursuer's firm to Mrs Wilson for the sums in question. They further knew that the pursuer's estate had been sequestrated, and that the pursuer had been discharged of all his debts due at the date of the sequestration. The defenders were, when writing said letter, well aware that they had no claim whatever against the pursuer for the said accounts,—that all matters between them had been finally closed months before. They had no occasion whatever to write to him in regard to the accounts. The actings of the defenders were wholly illegal and unwarrantable, and they were actuated in writing said letter by the desire, under the threat of criminal proceedings being instituted, to extort the said sums from the pursuer." (Cond. 5) "The estates of the said Ramsay Brothers and the pursuer were, as before stated, sequestrated upon 6th May 1889, under the Bankruptcy Statutes, and the sequestration was recalled under a deed of arrangement on 9th September 1889."

He further averred that, if the accounts referred to were not included in the settlement between the parties, this was the defenders' own fault. There was no averment that he had accounted, nor did he say that he was willing to account.

The defenders denied that the pursuer or his firm had ever acted as agents for MacLay & Co., and averred that these accounts had not been disclosed at the dissolution of partnership or at the subsequent settlement.

The defenders pleaded;—(2) The letter complained of will not reasonably bear the innuendo put thereupon by the pursuer, and the action should accordingly be dismissed. (3) The said letter was a privileged communication.

The Lord Ordinary (Kinnear) approved this issue:—"Whether the defenders wrote and sent, or caused to be written and sent to the pursuer a letter in the terms contained in the schedule hereto annexed" (i.e. the letter of 20th February 1890) "and whether the said letter is of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely and calumniously represents that he had dishonestly appropriated moneys belonging to the defenders, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?" *

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—There was no dispute that a letter addressed to a person might found an action of damages at his instance,[1] but to found an action for damages in respect of slander there must be an averment that the charges were false.[2] There was no such averment here; there was no averment by the pursuer that he had accounted, or a statement that he was willing to account. In any event, the communication was one which the defenders were entitled to make, and there must be an issue of malice.[1]

* "NOTE.—The words of which the pursuer complains are not in themselves actionable; but the innuendo which he proposes is not inconsistent with their natural meaning. The case of Mackay v. M'Cankie, 10 R. 537, appears to me to be in point."

The pursuer argued;—As regarded the necessity of putting malice in the issue, the better practice was that that should not enter the issue, but should be left to the Judge to direct the jury upon.[2] As regarded the innuendo, such an issue and innuendo would only be refused if the words would not reasonably bear the construction put on them by the innuendo,[3] a position which could not be taken up here, for the only meaning of the letter was that a criminal offence had been committed. If this had been a mere fashion of asking for the money the letter would have been written to the firm, and not to Robert Ramsay as an individual.

After the hearing the Court desired to be informed whether the moneys had been accounted for, or what explanation there was of their not having been paid. Counsel for the pursuer stated that the only explanation he could then give was that the cashier might have received the money and kept it. Subsequently he stated, as he had previously stated on record, that the two sums had been credited to MacLay & Co. in the books of Ramsay Brothers, but he did not say that he had accounted for them.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The question is whether the issue, with the accompanying innuendo which has been lodged for the pursuer, is to be allowed.

The case is rare in this respect, that the pursuer is complaining not of a slander uttered in public, but of a slander contained in a letter addressed to himself, which would not have obtained publicity unless he himself gave it publicity. Such an action is not known in England, but it is settled law that in this country the aggrieved party is entitled to sue for damages in respect of the injury done to his feelings.

Now, undoubtedly the defenders had good grounds for writing to inquire about the sum of money, for it had plainly been collected by the pursuer, and had not been accounted for to the defenders; it is not said to have been accounted for yet. But the question is whether the sting which they put into their letter is not such as to entitle the pursuer to an issue.

The letter certainly suggests very distinctly that if the pursuer did not take a particular course, the matter might be delivered over to the public authorities, with consequences which would be very unpleasant to the pursuer. That would not be actionable without the innuendo, but then I think that the innuendo can fairly be put as an interpretation on the language of that letter. It is for a jury to say whether, the letter being proved, the innuendo is also proved. I think the Lord Ordinary is right when he says that the innuendo is "not inconsistent with" the natural meaning of the letter. That being so, I think the case ought to go to a jury.

LORD YOUNG.—I am disposed to regard this as a case of first-rate importance. The dispute is a trifling one, but the letter which is complained of as a slander does not contain a single slanderous expression; it is a letter written by a clerk of the defenders' in the ordinary course of business, demanding payment of a debt which is due. Is that to found an action of damages?

Ramsay v. MacLay & Co.

It would be a strong thing in any case to make such a letter the foundation for an action of damages, and I should require a very exceptional state of facts before I could be persuaded to think it warrantable to send such a letter to a jury on mere general epithets—words of style—expressed as an innuendo.

Now, the state of facts here is this: Accounts due to the defenders had been uplifted and received by the pursuer or his cashier. It is admitted that both the accounts in question were due to the defenders, and to no one else. There was a question whether the pursuer by himself or cashier was entitled to receive the sums due under these accounts. That he had no title in a question with the defenders is certain. That his receipt to the debtor is good is equally certain, for he had been in use to collect such accounts, and the debtor had received no notice that his authority to do so had been recalled.

The case then is a case of a good discharge by a person who had himself no right to the debt. But the money had been uplifted, and when the true creditor asks the debtor for payment, the debtor exhibits receipts from the pursuer's cashier. The defenders then demanded payment from the pursuer, exhibiting these receipts from his own cashier, and liability is repudiated. The defenders then wrote the letter complained of.

Now, there is not a word in it which is not true: the money was uplifted, and was not paid over or accounted for. It was suggested at the bar by the pursuer's counsel that "perhaps the cashier kept the money." That suggestion was afterwards withdrawn, and it was admitted that the pursuer had got it. We allowed further time that information might be supplied to us to explain what he had done with it. The pursuer's counsel said he had no doubt that information could be got. After a fortnight's delay, however, we were told that the money could not be found or accounted for.

Now, no doubt the letter takes an unfavourable view of the conduct of the pursuer. But there is no misrepresentation of fact, and it is not slanderous to express an opinion that the matter is one for the consideration of the fiscal. I do not think it is slanderous on the part of any man, in the conduct of his business, misrepresenting no fact, and writing to the person himself against whom he has a claim, to say "Your conduct is unbecoming and requires investigation."

Where are we to stop? Suppose a letter written by a writer to the signet,—"My client informs me that you have uplifted money which is due to him, and have not accounted for it. That seems to me to be highly improper conduct, and unless I get an explanation of it I shall hand the matter to the procurator-fiscal." If that letter were made the ground of an action of damages for slander by an impecunious person, who thought he saw an opportunity of profit, would it be sent to a jury?

Or, when a Sheriff or Judge says that the circumstances of a case pending before him seem to be such that it will be his duty to send the papers to the Lord Advocate, has he uttered a slander, from the consequences of which he is only protected by the office he holds?

I think therefore, without hesitation, that both law and considerations of justice require that this action should be dismissed.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I agree with your Lordship in the chair. I do not think that we can withhold this case from a jury.

Shaw.—Your Lordships have not dealt with the question as to whether malice should go into the issue.

LORD YOUNG.—I should have said as regards that, that if the case is to go to a jury at all malice should certainly be put in the issue. If the complaint had been made to the procurator-fiscal it must have gone in. Why should it not now?

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I omitted to notice the matter in my opinion, but it was considered at consultation, and Lord Rutherfurd Clark and I thought it should not go in.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—The Judge will of course direct the jury at the trial on that matter. Understand that I am very far indeed from saying that malice need not be proved.

Simons' Trustee v. Neilson.

WILLIAM SIMONS (Mr and Mrs Simons' Trustee), First Party.—D.-F. Balfour—Jameson.
MATTHEW M. NEILSON AND OTHERS, Second Parties.—Murray—C. S. Dickson.

Succession—Husband and Wife—Married Women's Property Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. cap. 21), sec. 6—Marriage prior to Act—Jus relicti.—By antenuptial marriage-contract, entered into in 1862, a wife conveyed to trustees her whole estate, heritable and moveable, for payment of the free yearly income to herself during her life, exclusive of her husband's jus mariti and right of administration, and after her death for payment to her husband of an alimentary liferent of it, which was to cease on his entering into a second marriage. On the death of the spouses the capital was to be conveyed and paid to the issue of the marriage, if any, and failing them, to the wife's "own heirs whomsoever." The wife predeceased her husband, and there were no issue of the marriage. She left no further writing disposing of her estate. The husband took no benefit from his liferent, and married a second time shortly afterwards. In a special case, to which the husband and the wife's next of kin were parties, held that the former was entitled, under section 6 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1881,* to take one-half of his wife's estate.

Question, whether on the assumption that the husband had not married a second time, and had been in the enjoyment of his liferent of his wife's estate, he would also have been entitled to claim his share of the fee under the Act.

1ST DIVISION. C.

ON 18th August 1862 William Simons, shipbuilder, Renfrew, entered into an antenuptial contract of marriage with Miss Mary Montgomerie Neilson, and the marriage took place next day.

By the contract, so far as it dealt with the wife's estate, it was provided,—"For which causes, and on the other part, the said Mary Montgomerie Neilson, with consent of her said promised spouse, hereby assigns, dis-

(fourth) in the event of the said intended marriage being dissolved by the predecease of the said William Simons, and there being no child or children or their issue then alive, the said trustees shall pay over or reconvey to the said Mary Montgomerie Neilson the whole estate above conveyed; (fifth) in the event of the said intended marriage being dissolved by the predecease of the said Mary Montgomerie Neilson the said trustees shall, on the cessation of the liferent above conceived in favour of the said William Simons, in case of there being no child or children or their issue then alive, pay or convey the capital of the said estate to any person or persons whom the said Mary Montgomerie Neilson may have appointed to receive the same by any writing under her hand, and, failing such writing, to her own heirs whomsoever."

Mrs Simons died, domiciled in Scotland, on 30th December 1888, without having executed any writing disposing of her estate, except the contract of marriage. There were no children of the marriage.

The income of Mrs Simons' estate was regularly paid to her during her lifetime. After her death, it had been collected, and was in the hands of her husband, as sole surviving trustee under the marriage-contract. Her estate, as given up in the inventory, amounted to £2004, 17s. 7d.

Mr Simons entered into a second marriage in August 1889.

A question having arisen as to his right to one-half of his first wife's estate, a special case, to which he was the first party and his wife's next of kin were second parties, was presented for the opinion and judgment of the Court.

The question submitted was:—"Is the first party, as husband of the late Mrs Mary Montgomerie Neilson or Simons, or otherwise, entitled to one-half of her free moveable means and estate, inclusive of that portion thereof falling under her contract of marriage?"

Argued for the first party;—The trust purposes provided for in the marriage-contract having lapsed, he was entitled to one-half of the estate which was in bonis of his wife at her death, and at her absolute disposal. The trust was a mere burden on her radical right.[1] The only distinction between the present case and that of Fotheringham[2] was that here there was a liferent provision in favour of the husband. But he had taken no benefit from that provision during the few months that he was a widower, and he forfeited all right to do so when he married again.

Argued for the second parties;—The 6th section of the Married Women's Property Act enacted that the husband's jus relicti thereby created should be put upon the same footing as the wife's jus relictæ. But here there was a marriage-contract provision which the Court would not readily presume to be altered by subsequent legislation. Under the marriage-contract the wife conveyed away all her estate, and at the date of her death there was nothing in bonis of her. Until that event occurred, it could not be said who was to be the fiar of the estate. At her death her heirs took, and her husband could not claim in that capacity.[3] As trustee the first party was bound to keep up the trust, and the case was in this respect distinguishable from Fotheringham's case, where there was no liferent provided to the husband. The husband could not have discharged his alimentary liferent,[4] and there was not an absolute right of property in the wife as in Fotheringham's case.

Lord President.—In this case the lady's estate was conveyed to marriage-contract trustees for the purposes of the marriage-contract, but not for any other purpose, and I think it is well established by the case of Ramsay's Trustees that if the purposes of the marriage-contract have either failed or are satisfied, then it will follow that the estate which has been conveyed in order to secure the provisions of the contract becomes absolutely the property of the person who conveyed it. I do not think it is possible to doubt that doctrine.

What then are the provisions of this marriage-contract? There are provisions for the children of the marriage, and there is an alimentary liferent in favour of the husband if he should survive his wife. Beyond these there are no other provisions except in favour of the lady. There were no issue of the marriage, and accordingly the provisions in favour of the children have failed. The fact that there was an alimentary liferent provided to the husband was not inconsistent with the fee of the estate remaining vested in the lady herself. A liferent alimentary is nothing but a burden upon the fee, and in no way affects the property of the fee, and therefore it appears to me that if Mr Simons had claimed and enjoyed the alimentary liferent, the fee would still have been in the wife as at the date of her death. The trust-conveyance would only have existed for the purpose of providing for the alimentary liferent. Accordingly, I think Mr Simons would have been entitled to enjoy the liferent, and to have made his present claim.

But Mr Simons did not claim the liferent. He has uplifted the marriage-contract funds, but that was only in his capacity as trustee, and it is only in that capacity that they are now in his hands. So far from asking the liferent, he has renounced or abandoned all claim to it, and accordingly the case is reduced to this: Whether the same simple principle which we affirmed in the case of Fotheringham applies. There is no mystery about the 6th section of the Married Women's Property Act, 1881. It is provided there that "the husband of any woman who may die domiciled in Scotland shall take by operation of law the same share and interest in her moveable estate which is taken by a widow in her deceased husband's moveable estate according to the law and practice of Scotland." Nothing can be clearer than that. The husband's right, where he is the survivor of the spouses, is to be exactly of the same nature as that of the widow where the wife is the survivor. The section then goes on,—"And subject always to the same rules of law in relation to the nature and amount of such share and interest"—that is, the circumstances of each particular case are to be taken into consideration, e.g., whether the division is to be a bipartite or a tripartite one, according as there are or are not children of the marriage. The words which follow are,—"And the exclusion, discharge, or satisfaction thereof, as the case may be." There is no suggestion that there are words excluding, discharging, or satisfying the husband's claim under the 6th section of the Act, which accordingly extends to one-half of the estate vested in the lady at the time of her death, there being no children, and nothing to exclude, discharge, or satisfy the claim.

I need not repeat what I said in the case of Fotheringham. The two propositions which require to be made out are (first) that the estate was the property of the wife at the date of her death, and (secondly) that nothing has been done to discharge the husband's interest in the estate. These two propositions are completely made out in this case, and therefore I think that the provisions of the 6th section of the Act apply.

Lord Adam.—By her marriage-contract Mrs Simons conveyed her moveable estate to the marriage-contract trustees for certain purposes, one being that her husband, if he survived her, should have an alimentary liferent, and another that the capital should be conveyed to the children of the marriage if there should be any. The wife has predeceased her husband, who has not taken his aliméntary liferent, and there are no issue of the marriage. In these circumstances, I do not doubt that the principle of the case of Fotheringham applies. In the events which occurred the marriage-contract provisions were mere burdens upon the fee. I think that during the lifetime of the spouses the trustees held the estate for Mrs Simons, and for her alone. Upon the dissolution of the marriage the marriage-contract funds belonged to the wife, and were in bonis of her at the time of her death. I think it is clear that the 6th section of the Married Women's Property Act applies, and that the husband is entitled to the half of her moveable estate.

Lord M'Laren.—The section of the Married Women's Property Act of 1881 which is here founded on deals with the interest of the husband in his wife's estate, without distinction of the two cases where the marriage has been before and where it has been after the passing of the Act. The purpose of the section is to give identical interests to the husband and to the wife in the estate of the predeceaser. That object is accomplished without it having been thought necessary to deal specially with the rights of the husband as those existed at the date of the passing of the Act. The provisions of the section regarding the exclusion, discharge, or satisfaction of conventional claims have been deemed by the Legislature sufficient to meet the necessities of the case. In the present case there is neither satisfaction nor discharge, because the husband's second marriage has deprived him of his claim to a conventional provision, and accordingly the way is open to him to claim his jus relicti under the statute.

I desire to reserve my opinion as to the possible case where a husband married before the date of the Act claims a liferent of his wife's estate, and also a share of the fee of it, under the 6th section of the Act. I can see an answer to such a claim under the Act; and, besides, I do not think it would be consistent with our practice, in dealing with such claims at the instance of the wife, to allow legal and conventional provisions to be claimed concurrently. But it is not desirable to say more upon such a question at present.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find and declare that the first party, as husband of the late Mrs Mary Montgomerie Neilson or Simons, is entitled, under the operation of the 6th section of the Married Women's Property (Scotland) Act, 1881, to one-half of her free moveable means and estate, inclusive of that portion thereof falling under her contract of marriage."

WILLIAM BARR & SONS, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—Lord-Adv. Robertson—Low—C. S. Dickson.

CALEDONIAN RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders (Respondents).—D.-F. Balfour—C. J. Guthrie.

Railway—Common carriers—Haulage contract—Liability for loss of traders' waggons.—A railway company conveyed a trader's waggons containing coal along their lines, and after delivery of the coal conveyed the empty waggons back to the collieries, the sole charge made being a rate of 1s. 7½d. per ton, whereas the rate for the conveyance of coal on waggons belonging to the company was 2s. On the return journey some of the waggons were destroyed through an accident to the train caused by a latent defect in the waggon of another trader, which was in the same train. Held that the railway company were not liable for the safe delivery of the waggons as under a contract of carriage.

Question, whether the railway company would have been liable for the safe conveyance and delivery of the coal as under a contract of carriage.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Trayner. C.

MESSRS BARR & SONS, coalmasters, Glasgow, were owners of the Allanton and other collieries in Lanarkshire, which were connected with the Caledonian Railway system by means of sidings or branch lines, and they were in the habit of employing the railway company to convey their waggons or trucks of coal from their collieries to various parts of Scotland.

In May 1888 the railway company undertook to convey five waggons of coal from the Allanton Collieries to the general terminus at Glasgow, and there to deliver the coal on board ship. The coal was so delivered, but on the return journey part of the train, of which the five waggons formed a portion, left the rails, three of the waggons being destroyed, and the other two being damaged. The accident was admittedly due to a latent defect in a waggon which was in the train and belonged to a trader other than Messrs Barr & Sons.

Barr & Sons
v. Caledonian Railway Co.

Messrs Barr & Sons brought an action against the railway company for payment of the sum of £142, 3s. 3d., being £136, 10s., the cost of replacing the three destroyed waggons, and £5, 13s. 3d., the cost of repairing the others.

The pursuers averred that the defenders were and held themselves out to be "common carriers of coal and other minerals, and of waggons or trucks loaded with coal belonging to or provided by the traders or persons sending the coal. They carry, and undertake to carry, the coal, and the waggons loaded with coal, of any person who thinks fit to employ them, including the return of the empty waggons, and they have a regular service on their railways for the carriage thereof, and they perform all services incidental to the carriage, from the taking of delivery from the sender to making delivery to the consignee. . . ." (Cond. 6) "The services which the defenders undertook in regard to the said trucks of coal included the conveyance, and whole charge, control, and conduct of the same along their railway, the provision of sidings and cranes and other appliances necessary for delivering the coal into the ship, and the services, labour, and other incidents to the carriage and delivery, and also the return to the pursuers' colliery of the empty trucks."

The defenders admitted that they had been employed to haul the pursuers' waggons of coal to the general terminus, and the empty waggons back again, and that the haulage included the whole charge, control, and conduct of the waggons along the railway. They explained that it was impossible for them, by any ordinary inspection or by reasonable care and diligence, to have discovered the latent defect in the trader's waggon which had caused the accident, and that they were not responsible.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The defenders, as common carriers, et separatim under their contract with the pursuers, were bound to carry the said trucks and coal with safety, and having failed to do so, are liable in damages. (2) The pursuers' trucks having been injured by the breaking down of a waggon belonging to the defenders, or for which they were responsible, and while the said trucks were under their sole conduct and control, the defenders are liable in reparation.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The pursuers' statement, or the material portions thereof, being unfounded in fact, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor. (3) The defenders having used reasonable care and diligence in the inspection and haulage of the pursuers' waggons and of the other waggons composing the train (all the waggons of the train being those of traders) are entitled to absolvitor.

The Lord Ordinary (Trayner), on 28th November 1889, allowed a proof, and a reclaiming note by the defenders against the interlocutor allowing it was refused on 20th December following.

It appeared from the proof that the pursuers' pits were connected by branch lines belonging to them with the defenders' line of railway, and that they worked the traffic on the branch lines by engines of their own, the railway company taking on the loaded waggons to their destination when they were ready, the pursuers having no further charge or control over them, and none of their servants accompanying the waggons.* The railway company issued from time to time schedules of "Rates for the conveyance of coal . . . in waggon loads of four tons and upwards from Allanton Colliery," in which there were two columns of rates per ton, one for "company's" waggons, and another for "traders'" waggons.* At the date of this action the rate to the general terminus in company's waggons was 2s. per ton, and in owners' waggons 1s. 7½d. per ton. At the general terminus at Glasgow the railway company's servants put the waggons on a crane which belonged to the company, and tipped them into the ship. 2d. per ton was charged for that, and added to the rate. The waggons were then brought back by the company to the pursuer's siding, but this was covered by the one charge.†

the last three or four years. We put on those waggons for the purpose of keeping our collieries working, and on account of the impossibility of getting a regular supply of waggons when we required them from the railway company. The Caledonian have coal waggons of their own. It is the practice with a great many coalmasters to have waggons of their own also. Owners' waggons are built to a specification issued by the railway company, and must be passed by the railway company. Before they take them on to their line the railway company examine them to see if they are according to specification and suitable to run on their system."

* The following was "Excerpt from General Instructions of the Caledonian Railway Company for the guidance of agents and others:—34. Traders' or private waggons must be treated in every respect the same as the company's waggons, and agents must see that they are properly emptied and despatched to the works of the owners."

The following were "Regulations as to the use of Vehicles" issued by the company:—"The owners of all vehicles brought upon the railway are required to keep them in good repair, and in every respect in good working condition, and to have them thoroughly greased and properly examined each journey, and put in proper working order before leaving. If in transit any slight defect should be observed, which, for the proper and safe working, it is necessary to repair before the vehicles are allowed to proceed further, the company will, with consent of the owners, make such repairs, and charge them with all expenses incurred in effecting the same; but should an examiner omit, or be unable to detect any damage, weakness, or absence of parts, the owners of the waggons will be still held liable for any expenses which may be incurred by accident arising therefrom; and further, the owners will be held liable for any damage done to other vehicles, or to property belonging to or in charge of the company, by reason of any accident resulting from the improper condition of any of their vehicles, or from their failure; the examination by the company's examiners being made solely with a view to the safe working of their traffic, and by which the responsibility of the owners is not annulled nor in anywise reduced. . . ."

† Mr Archibald Hillhouse, the general goods manager of the Caledonian Railway, deponed:—"When the traffic arises at a colliery the waggons are marshalled by the colliery people, and they bring them down to the end of the siding, and we take them away. Before the train starts on its journey, those particular traders' waggons are put along with our waggons or with some other traders' waggons, as we direct, and by our servants. It may be that the particular colliery waggons are sufficient for a train by themselves. . . . The duties which the company perform after taking possession of the waggons are the same whether the coal is in traders' waggons or in company's waggons, with this addition that the owners' waggon is returned empty direct to the pit, and with this difference, that we make a lower charge."

‡ "OPINION.—I think this case is in no material respect distinguishable from the case of Watson v. North British Railway Company, 3 R. 637. It is true

No. 29.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—The case of Watson[1] was distinguishable, because the railway company's liability there was rested on the contract of haulage, and not on that of carriage. Anything said by the Judges in that case as to the contract of carriage was obiter, as the question was not really raised. It was a case of "fault" or "no fault." If a railway whose business was that of common carriers undertook to convey goods to a destination, they could not rid themselves of an obligation as common carriers. As regarded both coals and trucks, the contract was one of carriage. The nature of the defenders' liability could not be altered by the way in which they performed the duty, so long as they held themselves out as common carriers. No doubt a common carrier might limit the sphere of his obligation; he might carry subject to specified conditions, but without any such special condition or bargain he was subject to the general law of common carriage.[2] There was no such special bargain here. If a railway company offered to carry traders' goods on condition that the traders provided the waggons, they were bound to use reasonable care in carrying them. The edict nautæ caupones was applicable to the common carrier, grounds of public policy suggesting this, because there was a difficulty in proving fault in a case of the kind, where, as here, there was that in Watson's case the pursuer averred that his contract with the railway company was a contract of haulage, while in this case the pursuers aver that the defenders undertook the employment of conveying the waggons of coal in question, 'as common carriers.' The difference in averment can make no difference in the result, unless the difference alleged is proved to have existed in fact, which in my opinion has not been proved. The contract proved in this case cannot be better described than in the words by which Lord Shand described the contract in Watson's case, viz., 'The railway company undertook to carry coals for the pursuer in his own waggons at certain rates.' That is the whole contract in both cases. That being so, and the pursuers not having proved (or even averred) that the damage for which they sue was occasioned by any want of reasonable care or diligence on the part of the defenders, the defenders are entitled, on the authority of Watson's case, to absolvitor.

"The pursuers contended that the defenders having contracted to deliver the coals in question on board the 'James Groves,' a vessel lying at the general terminus, Glasgow, distinguished this case from Watson's; and that such obligation to deliver shewed that the contract between the parties to this action was one for carriage, imposing upon the defenders a carrier's responsibilities. I am not of that opinion. Even under a contract of haulage the defenders would be bound to deliver or hand over the coals conveyed under that contract to some person at the terminus or station to which they were addressed. That they tipped the coals out of the waggon into the hold of a vessel does not seem to me to make any difference in the obligations of parties. Suppose, instead, the defenders had tipped the coals out of the waggon on to the road or siding, to which under the contract of haulage they had been brought. That fact would not have converted a contract of haulage into a contract of carriage. In loading the vessel the defenders were acting as stevedores, not carriers, and I suppose they may act as stevedores in supplement of a contract of haulage just as well as in supplement of a contract of carriage. The contract under which the coals were to be conveyed to the general terminus was completed before the tipping began.

"I was referred to the case of the Aberdeen Commercial Company (6 R. 67) as affecting the authority of the decision in the case of Watson, but I do not see that it does so in any way; or that in that respect or otherwise it has any bearing on the present case. . . ."

full custody and control.[1] There was here a complete handing over to the railway company of the control of the waggons during the journey, the company determining their route and superintending their marshalling, &c. There was no discrimination in the railway company's contract as to the nature of the services to be performed, and the Lord Ordinary was wrong in thinking that "the contract was completed before the tipping began." There were not two contracts, the first ending when the engine left and the delivery on board ship began. There was no distinction in the wording of the undertaking between carrying in the defenders' waggons and in traders' waggons. The unloading at the general terminus was incidental to the contract of carriage. The company would be under an obligation to deliver a package of goods, and a waggon was a package on its own wheels, and the specialty of the packing (which led to the differential rates) did not relieve the company from liability as under a contract of carriage. The charges here were made by the company as common carriers under the 43d section of the Caledonian and Scottish Central Act, 1865 (28 and 29 Vict. cap. cclxxxvii.) (and also secs. 38, 39, 40), in which conveyance and carriage seemed convertible terms.* The equivalent clause under the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, was the 79th, and the company charged in the present case under that clause as common carriers, and not as tolltakers under sections 86-90. In the case of the Aberdeen Commercial Company[2] a distinction was drawn by the Lord President between the case where the conduct of the train was in the hands of the trader himself and the case where it was in the hands of the company; in the latter case they were said to act as carriers.

Argued for the respondents;—The railway company's contract here was to provide a road and locomotives, and allow the pursuers to put their vehicles upon it. Where the vehicles and the locomotive power were both supplied by the company the contract was one of carriage, and to that case the 79th section of the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, and the 43d section of the special Act applied. There was no direct provision in the earlier Railway Acts for a contract like the present. The danger which the edict nautæ caupones was designed to meet was that of robbery. But such a danger had nothing to do with the case where the vehicles were, as here, provided by the owner of the goods. There was no case in any system in which it had been held that the edict applied where the vehicles had not been provided by those who provided the carriage, except, perhaps, the American case which had been cited,[3] but of which no report was forthcoming. It might be that the case of injury to the goods was a different matter from that of injury to the vehicles, but where the empty vehicles had to be taken back to the original siding the only obligation was to draw the vehicles. The edict could not apply where, as here, no goods were being carried.[1] For instance, a train of new waggons belonging to the traders, and on their way to the traders' collieries, was not within the edict, and the present was a similar case. The charges which the railway company had power to make under their Act of 1865 were differential charges, applicable to different cases and circumstances. It was said, on the other side, that they were all charges for carriage, and the answer made to the defenders' argument was that, while it was contended that the contract was something less than one of carriage, nothing was said about the charges made for the carrying out of a contract of that kind. But all that the defenders guaranteed was the road and the haulage; they need never touch the goods themselves. It was said that the delivery at the general terminus was incidental to the services of a common carrier. But the defenders were not bound to provide a crane and hoist, and, as matter of fact, in the present case they charged for the use of these. Although the present question was not raised in the record in Watson's case, it was raised in the discussion, as was evident from Lord Deas' opinion, and the views expressed by the Judges in that case ought to be applied here. The cases of Richardson[2] and Bunch[2] illustrated the principles which were applicable to a contract like the present, and to one of carriage.

* The 43d section of the Caledonian and Scottish Central Railways Amalgamation Act, 1865 (which Act applied in this case), provided that "it shall not be lawful for the company to demand in respect of the conveyance on the said railways of the several articles, &c. . . . any greater sum, including the charges for the use of carriages and locomotive power, and all other charges incidental to such conveyance (except a reasonable sum for loading, covering, and unloading of goods at any terminal station of such goods, and for delivery and collection, and any other services incidental to the business or duty of a carrier, where such services or any of them are or is performed by the company), than the several sums hereinafter mentioned—that is to say," &c.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The material facts in this case may be stated very shortly.

The pursuers are in the habit of sending coals from their colliery at Allanton along the defenders' line of railway to various places of delivery. The coals are loaded at the colliery by the pursuers in waggons belonging to themselves, and the waggons so loaded are delivered to the defenders at the junction of the siding which connects the colliery with the defenders' main line. From that point the waggons are under the control of the defenders, who attach them to a general goods or mineral train consisting of waggons belonging partly to other traders and partly to the defenders, and are conveyed by the defenders' servants and by means of the defenders' engines to the place of destination, where the coals are delivered, and the pursuers' empty waggons are returned by the railway to the pursuers' colliery, as part of a train consisting as before partly of waggons belonging to other traders and partly of waggons belonging to the railway company. The charges for the conveyance of the coals is at a certain rate per ton per mile. But the rate is considerably smaller for coals conveyed in the coalowners' waggons, the reduction corresponding to the cost to the owners or the company of providing and maintaining the waggons.

The complaint of the pursuers is that on the 24th of May 1888 part of a train composed of five empty waggons belonging to the pursuers, which were being returned to the pursuers' colliery, and of other waggons belonging to other coal-owners and to the defenders, left the rails. It is proved that the cause of the disaster was a faulty waggon belonging to another coalowner; and the result was that three of the pursuers' waggons were destroyed, and the two others were injured. It is not, and in the circumstances could not be, alleged that any part of the coals in the pursuers' waggons was lost or injured. These coals were all safely delivered at the place of destination. The accident occurred after the delivery of the coals had been completed, and while the empty waggons were on their home journey. The claim of the pursuers is limited to £136, 10s., as the cost of replacing the three waggons which were destroyed, and £5, 13s. 3d. which will be required to repair the other two.

The pursuers do not allege or attempt to prove any negligence or fault on the part of the defenders, but rest their case entirely on the ground that the defenders are liable as common carriers for the injury to the pursuers' waggons.

It is not necessary for the decision of this case to consider whether the defenders were acting as common carriers of the coals contained in the pursuers' waggons, or whether in the circumstances they would have been liable as such for loss or injury of the coals in transit to the place of destination without any allegation of fault. The simple question is whether in the conveyance of the waggons as distinguished from the coals they undertook or were under the liability of common carriers.

Now, it is an essential element in the contract of carriage, whether by sea or land, under the edict, that the carrier shall be entitled to some remuneration or return for the obligation of safe carriage which he undertakes. But in the present case the railway company, so far as I can see, receives no price or consideration for conveying the waggons along the line of railway. They are willing to assume the position and liabilities of common carrier if the trader will pay them say 2s. per ton for the journey, and then they will convey the coals in their own waggons. But if the trader prefers to use his own waggons, and to load his goods in them in his own premises, the carrier gives the trader a deduction of say 4½d. per ton for the journey. Thus, the carrier, so far from making any charge for the conveyance of the trader's waggons, makes a deduction from his ordinary charge for carriage of coals in consideration of the trader furnishing waggons of his own. If the goods had been conveyed in waggons of the carrier he would have got a return for the use of these waggons, but that claim for a return or hire is abandoned in the existing contract, and the trader has his coals carried for 1s. 7½d. in place of 2s. per ton for the journey.

Further, the obligation of safe carriage, which in any view the defenders may have undertaken was, in my opinion, fully performed when the coals were delivered at the place of destination. The obligation of a common carrier is to deliver the goods entrusted to him in the like good order and condition in which he received them. Conveying the empty waggons back to the collieries and there placing them on the coalowners' siding is not an act of delivery in the sense of the edict, but the performance of an incidental obligation of the particular contract (a mixed and innominate contract), and so not part of the common law obligation of a common carrier, or of his obligation under the edict.

The case of the Great Western Railway Co. v. Bunch was cited by the pursuers as inconsistent with the opinion I have thus expressed. No doubt the judgment in that case assumed that a railway company is liable as a common carrier for passengers' luggage. But the ground of that assumption plainly was that the company regulated their charges for conveying passengers on the footing that each passenger should be entitled to have carried in the same train with himself luggage up to a certain weight, and so the railway company not only charged for the conveyance of the luggage, but also took the entire possession and control of it during the journey.

I am of opinion with the Lord Ordinary that this case must be decided in conformity with the principle which lies at the foundation of Watson v. The North British Railway Company, a principle which was adopted by all the members of the Court who took part in its decision.

LORD ADAM.—This is an action brought by Messrs Barr & Sons against the Caledonian Railway Company to recover the amount of damage sustained by five waggons belonging to them, which were injured on the defenders' railway on 24th May 1888.

The pursuers are proprietors of the Allanton Collieries. These collieries are connected by branches or sidings, belonging to them, with the Caledonian Railway. The five waggons in question had been sent by the defenders, loaded with coal, to the general terminus, Glasgow, for delivery into a ship, lying there, called the "James Groves." At the time the accident happened the coal had been duly delivered, and the waggons were being taken back empty to the Allanton Collieries. They formed part of a train of forty empty waggons belonging partly to the Caledonian Railway and partly to other coalowners.

The accident happened in consequence of a latent defect in a waggon belonging to another coalowner.

It is not maintained that there was fault on the part of the railway company, but liability is sought to be enforced against them on the ground that at the time of the accident the waggons were being conveyed by them as common carriers, and that therefore they were bound to redeliver the waggons in the like good condition in which they had received them. The railway company, on the other hand, maintain that they were not acting as common carriers at the time, and that is the question for decision in this case.

The manner in which the work is carried on would appear to be that the waggons are brought down loaded from the pursuers' pits by their servants to the company's line, and are there handed over to the company, and remain in their entire custody and control until they are again returned empty to the pursuers.

The coal, as a rule, is unloaded from the waggons by the consignees. But this rule is not invariable, more especially when the waggons are sent to shipping ports, and in this particular case the company undertook to deliver the coals into the ship "James Groves" at the general terminus.

But whatever the services might be which the company were to render, one charge only was made, which embraced everything.

This charge was fixed by the railway company sending to the owners of collieries having connections with their line a schedule of rates per ton which they were to charge for the conveyance of coal in waggon loads of four tons and upwards from the owners' colliery to a list of places on their line specified in the schedule.

The schedule sets forth two rates, one when the coal is to be conveyed in the company's waggons, and the other when it is to be conveyed in traders' waggons.

The schedule in force at the time in question would appear to be that dated 13th April 1885. In it the rate per ton for conveying coal in the company's waggons to the general terminus is 2s., and in traders' waggons 1s. 7½d. The difference—4½d—clearly represents the charge made by the company for the use of their waggons, because it appears from the evidence that the other services rendered by the company were in each case the same.

No. 29.

Nov. 21, 1890.
Barr & Sons v. Caledonian Railway Co.

But although only one charge is made, I think it is quite competent to analyse that charge in order to ascertain in respect of what services it is in point of fact made. An example of this will be found in the case of The Great Western Railway Company v. Bunch, L. R., 13 App. Cas. 31, where a passenger's fare was held to cover a charge for his luggage, so that the company were held liable as common carriers for its safety, although of course they were not liable as common carriers for his safety.

Now, in this case the services which the company undertook to render were to haul the waggons and their contents to the place of delivery, to deliver the contents to the consignees, to return the waggons to the owners, and to give the use of their line. We have not to decide whether the company would be liable as common carriers for injury to the contents of the waggons while in transitu, we have only to deal with the waggons, and it certainly appears to me that an undertaking by the company to haul waggons to a particular place, not to be delivered there, but to be hauled back when empty and redelivered to the owners, is not an undertaking of the nature of a contract of carriage which would make them liable for their safety as common carriers. I do not think that these services can be treated as merely incidental to the delivery of the coal. I think that the contract is essentially one of haulage and not of carriage, and therefore that the company are not liable as common carriers. In point of fact the coals had all been duly delivered before the accident happened.

The case most analogous to this which occurs to me is that of a person bringing a carriage to a public road and hiring horses to have it dragged to a particular place. The horse hirer in such a case would clearly not be liable as a common carrier. I do not see that it would make any difference in his liability in this respect whether or not he was left in sole charge of the carriage, or whether or not he undertook to deliver its contents; and the fact that the road in the one case is a public road and in the other the property of the company does not appear to me to make any difference.

But there is another ground on which I think the company are not liable, and that is, that they do not hold themselves out to the public as common carriers as regards such waggons. Mr Bell defines a common carrier thus (Bell's Princ. sec. 160)—"A common carrier is one who for hire undertakes the carriage of goods for any of the public indiscriminately from and to a certain place." It is obvious that it would be inconsistent with the working of the traffic of a railway, and the safety of the public, were a railway company to admit, or to be compelled to admit, to the use of their railway any carriage that might be brought to it indiscriminately, as Mr Bell says, by any of the public. The matter is, as might be expected, the subject of statutory regulation, and is provided for by the 110th and subsequent sections of the Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845. By the 110th section it is provided that no carriage shall pass along or be upon the railway, unless it be of the construction and be in the condition which the regulations of the company for the time being shall require, or in case of dispute as shall be settled by arbitration. The pursuers aver on record that the five waggons in question are of a construction approved by the defenders, and suitable for running on their line. That may be so, but it is no answer to the fact that in the matter of the use of the railway by waggons other than the company's own, both the company and the owners are under statutory regulations. It appears to me that when waggons are admitted and used on a railway only subject to statutory regulations, that the common law liability of carriers with respect to them is necessarily excluded.

The Lord Ordinary in deciding the case has not distinguished between the waggon and its contents, holding that in both cases the contract was a contract of haulage and not of carriage, and I am disposed to think he is right. Two elements essential to fix liability on the company as common carriers would appear to be absent in a case like the present, viz., entire responsibility for the soundness of the carriage, and for the packing of the goods, and the effect of that would have to be considered. It is not, however, necessary to decide that question in this case. I may remark, however, that the loading of such waggons as those in question is also made matter of statutory regulation by the 115th and subsequent sections of the Railways Clauses Act. In conclusion I have only to say that I think that the law laid down by the Lord President and Lord Deas in the case of Watson v. North British Railway Company is right, and that it rules this case.

Lord M'Laren.—Whatever view may be taken of the legal character of the contract between Messrs Barr and the Caledonian Railway Company, it is evidently a complex contract, and not an ordinary contract of carriage of the coal and the waggons taken together. My view of the contract may be best illustrated by supposing the case of a railway company which, instead of running its own waggons, hires them from a waggon-builder at so much per month or so much per train-mile. The charge which the company would make for the carriage of coal in their hired waggons would then be calculated on an estimate of the total cost of the carriage, one of the elements being the hire of the waggons. For the conveyance of coal in the coalmasters' own waggons the company would be able to make an abatement from the carriage commensurate with the hire of the waggons, and its profit would then be the same whether the coal was carried in waggons provided by the company or in waggons provided by the coalmaster. In the present case the Caledonian Company provides its own waggons, but these waggons can only be provided and maintained at a certain annual cost, and the company is therefore able to make an abatement from the price of the carriage of coal to coalmasters who provide at their own cost waggons suited for its transit by rail.

Such being the relations between the railway company and the coalmaster, it is reasonable to conclude that the responsibility of the railway company to the coalmaster for the safety of his waggons is similar in character and degree to the responsibility incurred by a company hiring waggons to the lessor. In other words, the obligation is to take due care of the vehicles, and the responsibility is for negligence. The difference between the two cases is that, in the case first supposed, the company pays rent or hire for waggons received on a contract of location, while, in the second case, the coalmaster receives a consideration for providing the waggons which are necessary for the carriage of the coal in the shape of an abatement of the price of the carriage. I think it is a just and convenient rule, and it is certainly in accordance with the best traditions of our jurisprudence, that in the case of innominate contracts the obligations of the parties and the responsibility for negligence should be the same as in the case of the nearest known contract. This principle would lead to two conclusions—(1) that the railway company is responsible for the safe carriage and delivery of the coal as under a contract of carriage; (2) that the company is responsible for the care of the waggons as under a contract of location. I do not mean that the contract is that of location, but the responsibility is the same, because the obligations of the parties are identical with those which would arise if the waggons were hired from a third party for a like purpose. The first conclusion is not necessary for the decision of this case, but I cannot in my own mind come to a satisfactory decision of the case without analysing the contract, and endeavouring to ascertain under what separate obligations the railway company received these waggons and their contents. It is to be kept in view that the waggons were being regularly run to and from the mines with coals for exportation, and, while so used, these waggons were taking the place of the rolling-stock of the Caledonian Company. The waggons were not being carried, but were being used as part of the apparatus for the carriage of goods over the company's line. This is quite different from the case of a railway carriage or waggon received by a railway company for delivery at a distinct place, and for which freight is paid. In such a case, if the waggons were injured on the journey, the question of the liability of the railway company would not be governed by our decision in the present case.

No. 29.

Nov. 21, 1890.

Barr & Sons v. Caledonian Railway Co.

At the date of its dissolution the society was infeft in certain heritable subjects. The trustee having sold these subjects the purchaser objected that the trustee was unable to give a valid title in respect that the company having been dissolved it could not grant a conveyance of subjects in which it was infeft at its dissolution, and that no provision was made in the Buildings Societies Act for such a case.

The trustee, in these circumstances, presented this petition, in which he prayed the Court "to grant warrant to, and authorise and empower the petitioner, Dugald Campbell, as trustee foresaid, without completing a feudal title in his person, on payment of the purchase prices, to execute and deliver dispositions, or other necessary and proper conveyances, of the several heritable subjects belonging to the West of Scotland Property Investment and Building Society, now dissolved, to the person or persons purchasing such heritable subjects."

Argued for the petitioner;—The society had been dissolved, and there was no statutory vesting of the property in the trustee. The Act of Sederunt, March 7, 1882, did not apply to cases of dissolution by instrument of dissolution. The only course open was to make the present application to the Court, for the Act of Sederunt might have been made applicable, and what the Court could do by Act of Sederunt it could also do under the present application.

Lord President.—Mr Campbell, the petitioner in this case, is the trustee appointed to wind up the affairs of the West of Scotland Property Investment and Building Society. The society itself was established under the Act 6 and 7 Will. IV. cap. 32, but at the date of its dissolution another Act—the Building Societies Act of 1874—was in operation, and it is this Act which regulates the manner in which the dissolution is to proceed, and determines the effects of such a dissolution. The 32d section of the Act enacts that a society under the Act may terminate or be dissolved in a variety of ways, and in particular—"3. By dissolution with the consent of three-fourths of the members, holding not less than two-thirds of the number of shares in the society, testified by their signatures to the instrument of dissolution." The Act then goes on to give a number of particulars which are to be set forth in the instrument of dissolution, and, among other things, "(e) the names of one or more persons to be appointed trustees for the special purpose, and their remuneration." The society was dissolved on 21st February 1889 in the manner to which I have specially tion of every dissolution or winding-up shall be sent to the registrar, and registered by him."

* " . . . (Fourth) After payment of the claims of depositors and other creditors the funds and property of the society shall be appropriated and divided among the members thereof in the proportion of the amount standing to each member's credit in the books of the society. (Fifth) Dugald Campbell, accountant in Greenock, is hereby appointed trustee for the special purpose of dissolution, and shall be remunerated by a commission of two and one-half per cent on the free funds divisible among the members. (Sixth) Full powers are hereby conferred on said trustee, with advice, direction, and control of the committee hereinafter named, to sell by public or private sale the heritable subjects belonging to the society, to call up and receive payment of all sums due to the said society by bonds and dispositions in security, and to exercise the powers of sale therein contained, to grant discharges thereof, and dispositions following thereon; and generally all powers necessary for the realisation and distribution of the assets competent to a trustee by the law of Scotland."

referred, and the instrument of dissolution provides, in its fourth head, for the division of the society's funds among its members after meeting the claims of its creditors. By the fifth head Dugald Campbell is appointed trustee, with a remuneration of 2½ per cent on the free funds. Then follows the sixth head, which is, perhaps, the most important of all:—"(Sixth) Full powers are hereby conferred on said trustee, with advice, direction, and control of the committee hereinafter named, to sell by public or private sale the heritable subjects belonging to the society; to call up and receive payment of all sums due to the said society by bonds and dispositions in security, and to exercise the powers of sale therein contained, to grant discharges thereof, and dispositions following thereon; and generally all powers necessary for the realisation and distribution of the assets competent to a trustee by the law of Scotland."

It appears from the statements in the petition that the trustee has sold certain heritable properties belonging to the society, but he is met by the difficulty that, in consequence of the dissolution of the society, he cannot give the purchasers a good title, and therefore he asks the Court "to grant warrant to and authorise and empower the petitioner, Dugald Campbell, as trustee foresaid, without completing a feudal title in his person, on payment of the purchase prices, to execute and deliver dispositions, or other necessary and proper conveyances, of the several heritable subjects belonging to the West of Scotland Property Investment and Building Society, now dissolved, to the person or persons purchasing such heritable subjects."

Now, the office of this petitioner is entirely statutory. He is given power to sell heritable estate, and also to grant discharges of real burdens, but no power has been given him to do either of these things without completing a proper feudal title in his own person. One thing is quite clear, that the statute must either have given him power to sell and dispose of these subjects without making up a feudal title in his own person, in which case our intervention is unnecessary, or it has withheld that power, in which case we cannot give him the assistance which he here asks for, for I am unaware of any jurisdiction in this Court to dispense with the ordinary forms of conveyancing in the case of dissolved companies of this kind. There is no creation of any such jurisdiction by statute, and it is not a case in which there can be any appeal to the nobile officium, because it is a matter depending entirely on the construction of the words of the statute. If we were to grant this power, it might turn out that what we had done was after all of no avail. It could not possibly shut the mouth of a purchaser from stating the objection that the trustee had no title to convey. That would be quite open hereafter, notwithstanding anything we might do in the way of granting this petition. In short, the question, if it is to be tried at all, must be tried in a totally different form from this, and in a way which will bind the parties who may be interested. I am for refusing the petition.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. I have been unable to understand the grounds upon which this petition has been brought. The Court, as we know, are in use to grant authority to judicial factors to sell heritable property because they are officers of Court, and we also grant authority to gratuitous trustees and others to sell and to make up title where they have power to come to us under statute; but I am not aware of any precedent or principle for anyone, whether a person appointed to wind up an estate or a private individual, coming to us and asking for authority to sell property without complying with the ordinary feudal forms, unless there is a statute authorising us to do that. I therefore entirely agree with your Lordship.

LORD M'LAREN.—I understand that the property, with reference to which this question arises, was vested in the company itself, and that the difficulty is due to the circumstance that the company is now dissolved. That raises a question between an intending seller and an intending purchaser. The estate must be taken in some way from the company, and there are well-known means of trying the question whether the seller is able to give a good title to the purchaser, but the way of doing it is not by a summary petition. I agree with your Lordship that we have no power to make the title any better than it is in the existing state of the titles; we have no authority to grant such a power as is asked, or to put the trustee, for the purpose of realisation, in any better position as regards his ability to dispose of the subjects than he is under the authority given to him by the statute.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am entirely of the same opinion. It is to be observed that the petitioner does not ask us for power to sell; all that he asks is that we should empower him, having sold, to give to his purchaser a disposition without completing a feudal title in his own person—that is to say, we are to decide in this petition, to which the purchaser is not and cannot be a party, that he is bound to accept such a title as the petitioner is in a position to offer him. I quite agree with your Lordship that it is impossible we could grant such a prayer as that. The petitioner can suggest nothing to shew that he is, in making this application to the Court, in a different position from that of any other seller whose title for one reason or another may be open to challenge. He is in the same position as any private person—no better and no worse, and therefore, as your Lordship pointed out, he is in this dilemma, he either has a good title to convey, and in that case he does not need our authority, or he has not a good title to convey, and in that case we are not in a position to give him a good title.

THE COURT refused the petition.

M.

ARCHIBALD HENDERSON, jeweller in Edinburgh, died on 23d October 1890, leaving a holograph settlement, by which he left his whole property in thirds to the families of a deceased sister and two brothers. He then provided,—"I appoint Mr Henry Tod, 45 North Castle Street, or his partner, Mr Rutherford, judicial factor, to carry out the purposes of this trust."

Mr Tod having presented a petition to the Sheriff of Edinburgh for confirmation as executor-nominate, the Sheriff-substitute (Rutherfurd) refused the prayer.*

* "NOTE.— . . . It is not uncommon in practice to confirm as executor-nominate a person upon whom executorial powers are conferred, though not expressly named executor by the deceased. But in this case the testator has named a 'judicial factor,' whose office differs from that of executor-nominate in this important respect, that the factor finds caution, while the executor-nominate does not."

The petitioner appealed, and the Court, without calling for argument, recalled the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor, and remitted to him to grant the prayer of the petition. No. 31. Nov. 25, 1890. Tod.

No. 32. Nov. 26, 1890. Adam v. J. & D. Morris.

Ship—Master—Cargo—Excepted perils—Duty of master in regard to goods damaged by excepted perils—Intimation to consignee.—There is a duty on the master of a ship, as representing the shipowner, to take reasonable care of the goods entrusted to him, and, in the event of loss or deterioration resulting from accidents covered by the exceptions in the charter-party, to take reasonable measures in order that the loss or deterioration may be minimised.

On the arrival of a steamship in port, the engineer, after filling the boiler, omitted to shut the sea-cock, the water thus making its way into the hold and wetting the cargo, which consisted of oil-cake. The shipmaster, who had previously to the accident lodged a protest in common form against wind and weather, instead of at once intimating the accident to the cargo-owner delayed doing so, and afterwards, with the assent of the shipowners, falsely represented to him that the wetting must have been due to over-straining at sea. In an action of damages by the cargo-owner against the shipowners, held that although the accident in question was within the exceptions of the charter-party exempting the defenders from liability for "the accidents of navigation, . . . even when occasioned by the negligence" of their servants, yet, as the master had neglected the duty of at once communicating the fact of the accident to the pursuer, thereby depriving him of the power of preventing further damage by immediately removing the cargo, the defenders were liable for the damage caused by the delay.

Opinions that the onus of proving that the damage to cargo had not been increased by the neglect of the master to communicate the fact of the accident to the pursuer was upon the defenders.

Ship—Seaworthiness—Modern appliances.—Observations (per Lord Kyllachy) as to how far the want of recent appliances in the equipment of a vessel will render her unseaworthy.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Kyllachy. C.

BY charter-party, dated Dundee, 11th October 1889, entered into between Mr William Adam, chemical manufacturer, Burghead, and Messrs J. & D. Morris, shipbuilders, Newcastle, it was agreed that the s.s. "Jubilant," of Newcastle, should proceed to Hull, and there load a cargo of about 150 tons of oil-cake, and proceed therewith to Burghead. The obligation to deliver the cargo was subject to the usual exceptions "the act of God, perils of the sea, . . . and other accidents of navigation excepted, even when occasioned by negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilot, master, mariners, or other servants of the shipowners), not answerable for any loss or damage arising from explosion, bursting of boilers, breakage of shafts, or any latent defects in the machinery or hull not resulting from want of due diligence by the owners of the ship, or any of them, or by the ship's husband or manager."

The "Jubilant" left Hull on 14th November, having shipped (1) 130 tons special oil-cake, "a few mouldy cakes, and a few broken," and (2) 168 bags of gypsum, weighing 16 tons 16 cwt., for which bills of lading were granted.

She arrived at Burghead on Monday, 18th November, but, on delivery of the cargo being tendered, Mr Adam declined to take some 40 tons of the oil-cake which had been stowed on the ceiling—i.e., the floor in the bottom of the hold—and damaged by water.

No. 32.

Nov. 26, 1890. Adam v. J. & D. Morris.

Mr Adam thereafter brought an action of damages against the Messrs Morris for the loss thereby sustained, which, it was admitted, was due to the fact that the bilge-cock had been, through the negligence of the crew, allowed to stand open after water had been pumped from the sea into the boilers in Burghead Harbour, on 19th November, by means of the donkey-pump, worked by a donkey-engine, and fed by a pipe which divided into two branches—one communicating with the sea, through which water from the sea was pumped up for filling the boilers, and the other communicating with the bilge, through which water that had got into the bilge was pumped out. The water had consequently flowed down the bilge-pipe into the hold, and had risen there to a depth of three feet upon the cargo. The pursuer further averred,—"In order to obviate these dangers, there are two very simple expedients which are in common use, and which are considered indispensable to the classification of any sort of vessel as seaworthy in Lloyd's register. Without one or other of them a ship is unseaworthy and unfitted for any voyage whatever. The first of these expedients is the placing on the neck or upper extremity of the bilge-pipe of a 'non-return valve,' that is, a valve which opens freely when water is being sucked up from the bilge, but which closes absolutely against water entering the pipe from above. The other expedient is the insertion at the junction of the sea-pipe and the bilge-pipe of a 'two-way cock,' so constructed that when the passage from the sea-pipe to the donkey-pump is open, that to and from the bilge-pipe is necessarily closed, and vice versa. Neither of said appliances existed on board the 'Jubilant,' but instead thereof she had only ordinary hand-cocks of a defective and antiquated pattern on her sea-pipe and bilge-pipe, and these were so constructed as to furnish no safeguard against the flooding of the hold and the wetting of the cargo therein, the safety of hold and cargo thus being made to depend entirely on the vigilance of the mariners in closing the cocks. . . . Further, the said vessel was defective and unseaworthy in respect that there was no sounding-pipe from the deck to the hold to enable the master of the vessel to ascertain at any time the state of the water in the hold." It was stated that it was also the duty of the defenders to have had a supply of dunnage on the ceiling of the hold, in order to raise the cargo above the parts likely to be wetted, and to enable the water to run freely away. It was also averred, by way of amendment after the closing of the record,—"Further, when the flooding of the cargo was discovered by the master and crew on the date of its occurrence, it became their duty, as custodiers of the cargo in the port of discharge, forthwith to inform the pursuer of the occurrence, or themselves to take steps to prevent further injury to the cargo. This they failed to do, and the defenders are responsible for said failure."

The pursuer also made a claim for payment for storage of the damaged goods.

The defenders averred that the damage was within the causes excepted in the charter-party, and that the vessel was well found and fitted.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The pursuer having sustained loss, injury, and damage as condescended on, through the negligence and breach of contract of the defenders or those for whom they are responsible, is entitled to reparation as concluded for, with expenses.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The pursuer having sustained no loss for which the defenders are responsible, they should be assoilzied, with expenses.

It appeared from the proof that, on the vessel's arrival at Burghead, the captain lodged a protest against wind and weather, "on Saturday, 16th, vessel shipping large quantities of water," causing her to put into Fraser-burgh for shelter on Saturday morning; that, although the captain knew of the accident on the evening of the 19th, the pursuer only discovered the damage the next afternoon after he had begun to discharge the oil-cake; and that, on applying to the captain, engineer, and crew, he could obtain no information from them; that he then had the cargo surveyed, and it was not discharged until Friday the 23d and following days, the pursuer having meantime declined to accept delivery of the damaged portion. Communications were proved to have passed between the captain and his owners (which are fully set forth in the opinions of the Judges) shewing that the captain intended to conceal the fact of the accident from the pursuer, and that he had represented the damage to be due to another cause, and that the owners did not disapprove of this being done.

The pursuer led evidence to prove that no coasting vessel ought to be without dunnage—however large the space was between the ceiling and the skin. Several skilled witnesses were also examined to prove his averments as to the want of proper appliances to prevent the flooding which had taken place.*

The Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy), on 5th June 1890, pronounced the following interlocutor:—(After findings as to the cause of damage, &c.)—"Finds that in these circumstances the pursuer thought it necessary to have a survey before taking further delivery, and that it was found impossible to have this survey till Thursday: Finds that the result of this survey was to leave the damage still unexplained, but that the damaged oil-cake was on the Friday and Saturday discharged and stored, and afterwards sold by mutual consent, reserving all questions of liability: Finds that the oil-cake was before being damaged of the value at Burghead of £8, 10s. per ton: Finds that the quantity damaged was 40 tons 16 cwts., and that the same fetched a total price (less expenses of sale) of £37, 2s. 8d.: Finds that the admission of sea water to the hold by the negligence of the engineer is admitted to have been an accident of navigation in the sense

* James Laing, consulting engineer and ship surveyor, Aberdeen, deponed to the necessity of non-return valves on board a trading vessel such as the "Jubilant" "If non-return valves were adopted, the existing arrangements could be made perfectly safe without altering the cocks. If there were non-return valves on the forehold-pipe and the engine-room bilge-pipe, the result would be that while water could be pumped up these pipes from the engine-room bilge and from the forehold, no water could pass down through them to those places. Non-return valves are so constructed that they will open upwards but not downwards, so that if water was to pass down those pipes it could not get past the valves. That is quite a usual arrangement, and has been in use for many years for donkey-pumps. I don't think the 'Jubilant' is properly fitted as regards her pipe and cock arrangements for any purpose. . . . . You might have water coming in in large quantities without anybody knowing anything about it, and flowing into the hold without any perceptible noise. I would not consider a ship so fitted 'tight, staunch, and strong, and every way fitted for a voyage.' I don't think she could be properly called seaworthy. . . . Lloyd's surveyors would never pass a vessel fitted with an arrangement like this. Their rule is that the arrangement must be such as not to permit water from the sea to come into the vessel by an act of carelessness or neglect. . . . I am also aware of the Board of Trade instruction to surveyors, that if water can run from the sea into the bilge there must be non-return valves. . . . The necessity for one or other of these arrangements is not affected by the size of the vessel. . . . An arrangement that might suit a tug or trawler would not necessarily suit a vessel carrying a perishable cargo; but no trawler, even, would be allowed to be fitted up with this arrangement if it were classed at Lloyd's, as they often are." There was other corroborative evidence to the same effect.

of the charter-party, and for which, in the absence of other default, the shipowners are not liable: Finds that the pursuer has failed to prove that the vessel was unseaworthy, or other than 'tight, staunch, and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage': Finds that he has also failed to prove that the use of dunnage in such cargoes is usual or necessary in such steamers, or that the same would have materially reduced the damage, or that the shipowners failed otherwise in their obligation of proper stowage; Finds, however, that it was the captain's duty to have at once informed the pursuer of the damage to the oil-cake, and also of the manner in which it had been caused, and that the shipowners are responsible for such part of the damage to the oil-cake as was due to the captain's concealment of those particulars: Finds that if the truth had been at once told, it would have been possible to have removed the 40 tons of damaged oil-cake in the course of a few hours, and that if this had been done the oil-cake would still have been worth not less than £6 per ton: Finds that the damage beyond this amount was due to the captain's concealment of the accident which had occurred: Finds in these circumstances that the pursuer is entitled to damages to the extent of £207, 13s. 4d., being the difference between the price of the 40 tons 16 cwts. at £6 per ton and the price which the said oil-cake realized: Finds that he is also entitled to the expenses of storage, being £5, 12s. 8d.," &c.*

* "OPINION.—In this case the question is as to the liability of the defenders, the owners of the steamship 'Jubilant,' for damage caused to a cargo of oil-cake by the admission of sea water to the hold of the vessel while she lay at Burghead Harbour in the month of November last.

"It is not disputed that the sea water found its way into the hold through the negligence of the defenders' servants. But it is, on the other hand, admitted that the accident is to be considered an accident of navigation, and that for such accidents the shipowners are under the charter-party not responsible, unless and in so far as it can be shewn that the damage was due to the unseaworthiness of the vessel, or to the shipowners' failure to provide proper stowage, or to some default on the part of the captain or crew after the accident had occurred.

"The pursuer, the owner of the cargo, maintained that the vessel was not seaworthy—that is to say, was not, in the words of the charter-party, 'tight, staunch, and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage,'—and he maintained this upon the ground that she was not provided with what he contended were certain usual and simple appliances for guarding against such negligence as occasioned the accident.

"It was not, however, disputed that—assuming ordinary care on the part of the master and crew—the vessel was seaworthy enough. And, in these circumstances, the defenders (the shipowners) claim that the case falls within the principle laid down by the House of Lords in the case of Steel v. Craig, 5 R. (H. L.) 103, L. R., 3 App. Cas. 72. And in this I am of opinion that the shipowners are right. I do not say that under his general obligation to provide a seaworthy ship a shipowner may not be bound to provide those aids to navigation and precautions against accident which have come to be universally used, and upon which accordingly persons chartering a vessel may be entitled to rely. Reference was made in the course of the argument to the mariner's compass, and to the ordinary safety-valve in steam-boilers, as illustrating this obligation. But I am not satisfied upon the proof that the automatic appliances of whose absence the pursuer here complains are as yet universal or even common in vessels of the class to which the defenders' vessel belongs. And it is, I think, noteworthy that, while the Board of Trade have and exercise the power to stop vessels on the ground of unseaworthiness, they do not insist as a condition of seaworthiness upon the introduction of such appliances as those referred to. On this part of the case, therefore, my opinion is with the shipowners.

"I am also in favour of the shipowners on the question of stowage. The pursuer's complaint is, that dunnage was not used in stowing the oil-cake.

No. 32.

Nov. 26, 1890.
Adam v. J. & D. Morris.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The Lord Ordinary had found that the damage which the pursuer had suffered was referable to the concealment of the captain. But the defenders were not responsible for the captain's misrepresentation. This was very like the cases in which it had been held that the owners were not responsible for the damage caused to a third party through the granting of a false bill of lading by the captain for the benefit of his owners.[1] The case of Notara[2] had no application to the present. There, at the time of the accident, the master had exclusive custody of the cargo. Here the vessel had reached port, and there was no duty of disclosure to the consignee, because the latter was present upon the spot, and it was his duty at once to take steps to have his cargo discharged. The obligation upon him was to take delivery and pay full freight. He could not refuse to touch the goods, but was bound to have them discharged quam primum, although he might set off any claim of damages he had as against the freight.[3] In point of fact he had refused to take delivery and had had the cargo surveyed. The evidence was to the effect that, even if he had had the cargo removed at once, the wetting could not have been prevented. Further, even if the pursuer had known as early as possible that the accident had occurred, it did not appear that he would have acted otherwise than he did. There was nothing to support the Lord Ordinary's view that if immediate information had been given the cargo could have been landed more quickly than was the case, or that the damage would have been reduced.

But while there is some conflict of evidence on this subject, the pursuer has, in my opinion, failed to prove that dunnage is either usual or necessary in coasting steamers such as the 'Jubilant,' making such voyages as the voyage in question.

"It remains, however, to consider whether the damage complained of was not at least greatly aggravated by the failure of the captain and the crew to communicate to the pursuer, as soon as they themselves knew it, the fact of the accident, and the manner of its occurrence. I cannot doubt that in this matter it is the duty of the shipowner, and those representing him, to act fairly and honestly by the shipper—to do all in their power to minimise damage, and generally, when damage occurs, to do their best in the interests of the shipper. If it were necessary to appeal to authority on that point, the case of Notara and Another v. Henderson and Others, Feb. 16, 1872, L. R., 7 Q. B. 225, mentioned at the debate, appears to me to be a sufficient authority. And that being so, it seems to me that the true and only serious question in the case is, whether and how far the damage done to this oil-cake might have been prevented if the captain and engineer had duly disclosed to the pursuer (1) the fact of the flooding of the oil-cake, and (2) the manner in which that flooding had occurred. Upon that question my opinion is with the pursuer. It is, I think, the fair result of the evidence, that if immediate information had been given, the damaged oil-cake could, and in ordinary course would, have been removed from the hold in a few hours, and, if so removed, could and would have been so treated as to make the damage comparatively slight. I think that the delay which occurred was the fair and natural result of the concealment which the captain and the crew practised, and that but for that delay the oil-cake, instead of realising on an average less than £1 per ton, would have realised about £6 per ton. I therefore propose to find the shipowners liable for the damage claimed to the extent of the difference represented by those two figures.

"I think the pursuer is also entitled on the same principle to the expense of storage as claimed by him. . . ."

Adam v. J. & D. Morris.

Argued for the respondent;—Upon the question of unseaworthiness: The view of the Lord Ordinary upon this branch of the case was not borne out by the evidence. The antiquated character of the pumps, safety-valves, &c. rendered the vessel unseaworthy. A principal was always liable for the fraud of his agent while acting within the scope of his authority.[1] There was a duty upon the captain of this vessel to see to the safety of the cargo, and if any damage occurred at once to apprise the consignee. As representing the owners he was equally bound with the pursuer to use diligence in the discharge of the cargo, and loss for delay caused by him must fall upon them.[2] Here he had failed to use the necessary diligence, and the evidence shewed that he and the owners had conspired to conceal the true state of the fact from the consignee. In answer to the argument that even if the true state of the fact had been disclosed the cargo could not have been sooner landed and the result would not have been different, it was for the reclaimers to prove this, and they had not done so. They had not even called the captain of the ship.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The vessel "Jubilant," of Newcastle, sailed from Dundee under a charter-party, by which she was taken bound to proceed to Hull, and there take in a cargo of oil-cake (about 150 tons), and being so loaded to proceed therewith to Burghead on being paid freight at a certain rate in full of all port charges and pilotages. The vessel performed her voyage in terms of the charter-party, and arrived at Burghead on 18th November 1889. The first thing the master did when he arrived in port was to note a protest, in which he stated that he had "experienced foggy weather from time of leaving up till Friday night, 15th, and had strong wind and heavy sea from N.N.W. on Saturday the 16th, vessel shipping large quantities of water. Put into Fraserburgh for shelter on Saturday morning 9 A.M. on same day, and sailed from there on Sunday, 17th, at 10.30 P.M., and arrived at Burghead on Monday the 18th at 7.30 A.M."; and in the interest of all concerned he notified a protest in the usual manner. Now, the meaning of the protest was that any damage which had been sustained was the result of stormy weather. That is the ordinary meaning of a protest, and unless something else is expressed that is always what a protest is understood to mean.

After the vessel arrived in port an accident took place through the fault of the engineer, who, while engaged in pumping water into the boiler, left what is known as the sea-cock open, and the water consequently made its way into the hold of the vessel, and thereby damaged to a considerable extent the cargo belonging to the pursuer. The accident which thus happened was clearly within the exceptions stated in the charter-party, which exempts the shipowners from liability for loss arising, among other things, from "accidents of navigation . . even when occasioned by negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilot, master, mariners, or other servants of the shipowners." The engineer being in the service of the owners they are not liable for damage occasioned by his negligence, but his negligence is not the matter complained of in this action. What the pursuer complains of is that the master of the ship, although he was aware of what had occurred, not only refrained from communicating to him that such an accident had occurred, but fraudulently attributed the wetting of the cargo to a different cause.

It appears to me that the pursuer has succeeded in this part of his case. There is a great deal of evidence which it is unnecessary for me to go over, but there are one or two documents to which I think it necessary to refer, and which I think are quite sufficient to establish this part of the pursuer's case.

On the 20th of November 1889 the master telegraphed to the defenders, who are the owners of the vessel, in these terms:—"No discharging cake. Unfortunately engineer left sea-cock open last night, and spoiled part cargo. Merchant does not know this yet, but noted protest on arrival," the last clause signifying that the master had noted a protest on the arrival of the vessel. On the same day the master followed up his telegram by a letter, in which he said,—"If the weather permits us to work I will be all out to-morrow, as the merchant is only taking the good cake off the top, and then start with the damaged, therefore I cannot say what quantity there will be, as the water has been six inches on the engine-room floor, therefore the water has been the full length of the ship, and that means a good deal of damaged, but I have not mentioned to anyone about the sea-cock being neglected; therefore the only chance for us is to hold to the protest, and having to put into Fraserburgh by stress of weather, as I have told the merchant the ship must have got strained, and then taken up in smooth water, as she is nice and tight." He there states distinctly that he made a misrepresentation in point of fact as to the cause of the damage, and that statement the defenders allow to be made without challenge, and thereby make it their own. In the course of further correspondence this is made even more clear by a passage in a letter from the owners to the master, in which, referring apparently to a proposal which had been made by the latter to assign a different cause for the damage to the cargo in the log-book from that which had already been assigned, they say,—"Yours of yesterday with B/L to hand. You must not on any account alter the log-book,"—that is, the log-book is to stand with the statement under 18th November, that the master had noted a protest in common form against wind and weather, and had ascribed the damage to stormy weather met with at sea instead of to the true cause, viz., the engineer's negligence, which was known both to him and the owners. These documents, I think, establish beyond dispute, not only that the master concealed from the merchant the real cause of the damage, but that he ascribed it, with the knowledge and assent of the defenders, to a different cause altogether from the true one.

That being so, it is very difficult to see how it is possible to differ from the statement made by the Lord Ordinary that in this matter the duty of the shipowners and their representatives was to act fairly and honestly by the shippers, and that if they neglected this duty they must be held liable for the consequences. The conduct of the master does not fall within the same category as that of the engineer. It is the duty of a master, when an injury has been caused to cargo by an excepted cause, to repair by all the means in his power the mischief which has been done, and to land the cargo in as good a condition as the circumstances will admit. The neglect of this duty does not fall within the exceptions in the charter-party. It is a plain duty required of the master to the shipowners and the merchant and all concerned. Not only did the master in this case not fulfil that duty, but he violated it in the most gross manner.

The Lord Ordinary has referred to one authority, though his Lordship thought it almost unnecessary to appeal to authority because the principle was so very apparent, but the doctrine is so very clearly expounded in that case—Notara and Another v. Henderson and Others, L. R., 7 Q. B. 225—by Mr Justice Willes that I think it worth while to ask your Lordships' attention to one or two short passages in his judgment. He describes the duty of the master to which I have been referring "as a duty imposed upon the master, as representing the shipowner, to take reasonable care of the goods entrusted to him, not merely in doing what is necessary to preserve them on board the ship during the ordinary incidents of the voyage, but also in taking reasonable measures to check and arrest their loss, destruction, or deterioration by reason of accidents, for the necessary effects of which there is, by reason of the exception in the bill of lading, no original liability." That is precisely the duty which I have been endeavouring to describe, and it occurred in circumstances quite analogous to the present case, because the bill of lading in that case contained a clause quite as strong in its terms as the clause in the charter-party here. His Lordship goes on further to say,—"The exception in the bill of lading was relied upon in this Court as completely exonerating the shipowner, but it is now thoroughly settled that it only exempts him from the absolute liability of a common carrier, and not from the consequences of the want of reasonable skill, diligence, and care, which want is popularly described as 'gross negligence.'" That appears to me to be the sound doctrine applicable to a case such as the present, and it is precisely in point. Applying that doctrine of law to this case it is perfectly plain that the master not only failed in the exercise of reasonable diligence and care, but grossly and purposely violated his duty.

But it is said that, although that is the case, the cargo was in the circumstances so thoroughly damaged before it could have been got out that no damage, or at least, if any, only very slight damage was in point of fact sustained by the pursuer in consequence of the master's conduct, and that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary on that point is wrong. What the Lord Ordinary says is this—"It is, I think, the fair result of the evidence, that if immediate information had been given the damaged oil-cake could, and in ordinary course would, have been removed from the hold in a few hours, and if so removed could and would have been so treated as to make the damage comparatively slight." In that view of the evidence I concur.

Apart, however, altogether from that view of the evidence, I think the contention of the defenders may be met by another answer, to the effect that it is not in the mouth of the master or shipowners to say that the goods could not have been removed in a few hours. It is not in the mouth of the person who has deprived the merchant of the power of removing his goods to say that. It was the conduct of the master which made the removal of the goods an impossibility. We cannot tell—nobody can tell—how much of the cargo might have been saved but for that conduct, because we do not know the appliances or the number of workmen that might have been employed, and it depends on these facts whether the cargo could have been removed in time or not. Therefore I think, on the whole case, the defenders are not entitled to make the answer to the pursuer's claim that the cargo could not have been removed in time, because they, or rather their representatives, failed to give him the opportunity of trying to remove it.

On the merits of the case, therefore, I think the decision of the Lord Ordinary is in accordance with justice and authority.

Adam v. J. & D. Morris.

LORD ADAM.—This is an action of damages brought by a cargo-owner against shipowners for injury done to the cargo on a voyage from Hull to Burghead, and before the cargo came into the pursuer's hands. There is no question that the cargo was damaged to a large extent, nor is there any question as to the immediate cause of the damage. We know that the ship arrived at Burghead on 18th November, and that while it was lying there on 19th November the engineer opened the sea-cock for the purpose of filling the boiler, and that having had a dispute with the captain he went on shore without remembering to shut the sea-cock, with the consequence that the sea water got into the vessel to the depth of 3 feet. The mistake of the engineer was the immediate cause of the damage, and so far as the direct damage is concerned, it is admitted that the pursuer has no claim to be compensated for it, in respect of the clause in the charter-party which declares that the shipowners shall not be liable for the negligence of the "master, mariners, or other servants of the shipowners." But then, as I understand the position taken up by the pursuer, it is this—he admits that to some extent the damage was due to the negligence of the engineer, but denies that the entire damage was due to that cause, maintaining that part of the damage was due to conduct of the master for which the shipowners are responsible, and this raises the controversy between the parties.

The conduct of the master which is complained of is this—and there is no dispute about the facts—that the master, though aware on the night of the 19th of November of the accident which had occurred, and of the water being in the hold of the vessel, failed to communicate to the pursuer, when it came to his knowledge, I do not say the cause, but even the fact of the accident, and left him to find out the wet state of the cargo for himself, which he did the following (Wednesday) afternoon. The pursuer further says that when he did discover the fact that water was in the hold, the master made a direct allegation of a false character as to the cause; and this appears to be the case from the correspondence between the master and the shipowners, for the master first telegraphs to the shipowners informing them of the accident, and saying that the merchant does not know of it yet, and then in a letter written the same day says that he has told the merchant the ship must have got strained. So that we have it under the hand of the master not only that he concealed the truth, but that he made a direct misrepresentation to the merchant as to the cause of the accident, and the pursuer maintains that the extra damage beyond that necessarily caused by the inroad of water was caused by the master's conduct, for the reason that if the master had disclosed to him the state of the cargo, as was his duty, it would only have been damaged to a very small extent, and would not have been totally destroyed.

With regard to the duty of the master in the circumstances which arose, I agree with the principles laid down in Notara's case, and expressed in the passages read by your Lordship. It was said, however, in the course of the argument, and with truth, that the circumstances of that case were not the same as the present, the difference being that in the Notara's case the injury to cargo happened in the course of the voyage, the circumstances there being that the vessel, having put into a port for repairs, was in that port when the accident took place. It was held that in such circumstances it was the duty of the master to endeavour to diminish any loss resulting from the accident.

In this case the fact that the ship had finished its voyage makes no difference as to the master's duty in the circumstances, for the cargo was still in his custody,

At the date of its dissolution the society was infeft in certain heritable subjects. The trustee having sold these subjects the purchaser objected that the trustee was unable to give a valid title in respect that the company having been dissolved it could not grant a conveyance of subjects in which it was infeft at its dissolution, and that no provision was made in the Buildings Societies Act for such a case.

The trustee, in these circumstances, presented this petition, in which he prayed the Court "to grant warrant to, and authorise and empower the petitioner, Dugald Campbell, as trustee foresaid, without completing a feudal title in his person, on payment of the purchase prices, to execute and deliver dispositions, or other necessary and proper conveyances, of the several heritable subjects belonging to the West of Scotland Property Investment and Building Society, now dissolved, to the person or persons purchasing such heritable subjects."

Argued for the petitioner;—The society had been dissolved, and there was no statutory vesting of the property in the trustee. The Act of Sederunt, March 7, 1882, did not apply to cases of dissolution by instrument of dissolution. The only course open was to make the present application to the Court, for the Act of Sederunt might have been made applicable, and what the Court could do by Act of Sederunt it could also do under the present application.

Lord President.—Mr Campbell, the petitioner in this case, is the trustee appointed to wind up the affairs of the West of Scotland Property Investment and Building Society. The society itself was established under the Act 6 and 7 Will. IV. cap. 32, but at the date of its dissolution another Act—the Building Societies Act of 1874—was in operation, and it is this Act which regulates the manner in which the dissolution is to proceed, and determines the effects of such a dissolution. The 32d section of the Act enacts that a society under the Act may terminate or be dissolved in a variety of ways, and in particular—"3. By dissolution with the consent of three-fourths of the members, holding not less than two-thirds of the number of shares in the society, testified by their signatures to the instrument of dissolution." The Act then goes on to give a number of particulars which are to be set forth in the instrument of dissolution, and, among other things, "(e) the names of one or more persons to be appointed trustees for the special purpose, and their remuneration." The society was dissolved on 21st February 1889 in the manner to which I have specially referred, and the instrument of dissolution provides, in its fourth head, for the division of the society's funds among its members after meeting the claims of its creditors. By the fifth head Dugald Campbell is appointed trustee, with a remuneration of 2½ per cent on the free funds. Then follows the sixth head, which is, perhaps, the most important of all:—"(Sixth) Full powers are hereby conferred on said trustee, with advice, direction, and control of the committee hereinafter named, to sell by public or private sale the heritable subjects belonging to the society; to call up and receive payment of all sums due to the said society by bonds and dispositions in security, and to exercise the powers of sale therein contained, to grant discharges thereof, and dispositions following thereon; and generally all powers necessary for the realisation and distribution of the assets competent to a trustee by the law of Scotland."

It appears from the statements in the petition that the trustee has sold certain heritable properties belonging to the society, but he is met by the difficulty that, in consequence of the dissolution of the society, he cannot give the purchasers a good title, and therefore he asks the Court "to grant warrant to and authorise and empower the petitioner, Dugald Campbell, as trustee foresaid, without completing a feudal title in his person, on payment of the purchase prices, to execute and deliver dispositions, or other necessary and proper conveyances, of the several heritable subjects belonging to the West of Scotland Property Investment and Building Society, now dissolved, to the person or persons purchasing such heritable subjects."

Now, the office of this petitioner is entirely statutory. He is given power to sell heritable estate, and also to grant discharges of real burdens, but no power has been given him to do either of these things without completing a proper feudal title in his own person. One thing is quite clear, that the statute must either have given him power to sell and dispose of these subjects without making up a feudal title in his own person, in which case our intervention is unnecessary, or it has withheld that power, in which case we cannot give him the assistance which he here asks for, for I am unaware of any jurisdiction in this Court to dispense with the ordinary forms of conveyancing in the case of dissolved companies of this kind. There is no creation of any such jurisdiction by statute, and it is not a case in which there can be any appeal to the nobile officium, because it is a matter depending entirely on the construction of the words of the statute. If we were to grant this power, it might turn out that what we had done was after all of no avail. It could not possibly shut the mouth of a purchaser from stating the objection that the trustee had no title to convey. That would be quite open hereafter, notwithstanding anything we might do in the way of granting this petition. In short, the question, if it is to be tried at all, must be tried in a totally different form from this, and in a way which will bind the parties who may be interested. I am for refusing the petition.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. I have been unable to understand the grounds upon which this petition has been brought. The Court, as we know, are in use to grant authority to judicial factors to sell heritable property because they are officers of Court, and we also grant authority to gratuitous trustees and others to sell and to make up title where they have power to come to us under statute; but I am not aware of any precedent or principle for anyone, whether a person appointed to wind up an estate or a private individual, coming to us and asking for authority to sell property without complying with the ordinary feudal forms, unless there is a statute authorising us to do that. I therefore entirely agree with your Lordship.

No. 30.

Campbell.

LORD M'LAREN.—I understand that the property, with reference to which this question arises, was vested in the company itself, and that the difficulty is due to the circumstance that the company is now dissolved. That raises a question between an intending seller and an intending purchaser. The estate must be taken in some way from the company, and there are well-known means of trying the question whether the seller is able to give a good title to the purchaser, but the way of doing it is not by a summary petition. I agree with your Lordship that we have no power to make the title any better than it is in the existing state of the titles; we have no authority to grant such a power as is asked, or to put the trustee, for the purpose of realisation, in any better position as regards his ability to dispose of the subjects than he is under the authority given to him by the statute.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am entirely of the same opinion. It is to be observed that the petitioner does not ask us for power to sell; all that he asks is that we should empower him, having sold, to give to his purchaser a disposition without completing a feudal title in his own person—that is to say, we are to decide in this petition, to which the purchaser is not and cannot be a party, that he is bound to accept such a title as the petitioner is in a position to offer him. I quite agree with your Lordship that it is impossible we could grant such a prayer as that. The petitioner can suggest nothing to shew that he is, in making this application to the Court, in a different position from that of any other seller whose title for one reason or another may be open to challenge. He is in the same position as any private person—no better and no worse, and therefore, as your Lordship pointed out, he is in this dilemma, he either has a good title to convey, and in that case he does not need our authority, or he has not a good title to convey, and in that case we are not in a position to give him a good title.

THE COURT refused the petition.

Young v. Aktiebolaget Ofverums Bruk.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—It was a mistake to say that the iron here in question was stored in the proper sense of the word. The whole arrangements of the Dock Commissioners shewed that. They did not hold themselves to be responsible for goods left in their sheds any more than for goods left on the open quay. The iron therefore was truly in the actual custody and possession of Ommundsen; it was not stored, or if stored, it was in a store which, for the present purpose, must be regarded as Ommundsen's. The arrestments therefore were good in his hands, if the iron was the property of the defenders,[1] which it was. For although the defenders were indebted to the English company, and the price of the iron when it was sold was to be imputed to that debt, yet, until sold, it remained the property of the defenders. It did not affect the validity of arrestments to found jurisdiction, which were not to be followed by a furthcoming, that ultimately on an accounting no debt should be found to its being sold, and the price applied in part payment of a debt due by the defenders to Williams' company. On the arrival of the ship in Bo'ness, Williams sent the bill of lading to Ommundsen, with instructions to take delivery of the iron, and to warehouse it to his (Williams') order. Ommundsen did so, and warehoused the iron in a shed belonging to the Bo'ness Dock Commissioners, of which shed the Commissioners keep the key, and for the use of which they charge a rent. The iron was not warehoused in Williams' name, neither was it warehoused in that of Ommundsen. In fact no name was mentioned. But there seems no doubt that Ommundsen could have got possession of the iron at any time, and that the Dock Commissioners at first at least looked to him for the rent. On the other hand, there seems equally little doubt that the iron was deposited with the Dock Commissioners by Ommundsen acting as Williams' agent; that it was thus held by the dock company on behalf of Williams; and that Ommundsen, at the date when the arrestments were laid on, was neither in actual possession of the iron, nor answerable therefor to the defenders, with whom he had no contract, and of whom he knew nothing.

"In these circumstances, I hold the arrestments to have been ineffectual, and I do so irrespective altogether of the defenders' contentions (1) that the property of the iron had passed to Williams, and (2) that at all events the iron had been specially appropriated so as to exclude any arrestment of it in specie. It may be that the arrestment would have been good if laid on in the hands of the Dock Commissioners. It may be that it would have been good in the hands of Ommundsen, if Ommundsen had had the iron in his own store. It might also have been a good arrestment if the iron had been consigned by the defenders to Ommundsen; or if he had been employed by or on behalf of the defenders; or had in any other way become liable to account to the defenders for the iron or its proceeds. But, as the facts stand, Ommundsen was I think merely in the position of an intermediary between Williams, the defenders' debtor, and the Dock Commissioners, the custodiers of the iron; and that being so, he stood in no relation either to the defenders or to the iron which, in my opinion, justified an arrestment in his hands.

"The pursuer founded on the case of Appin's Creditors, M. 749. But that case seems to me to illustrate the present case by contrast. The arrestments there sustained were laid on (1) in the hands of Fraser, who was the agent of and accountable to the common debtor, and (2) in the hands of Brodie, in whose warehouse Fraser had stored the furniture which was the subject of the arrestment.

"The pursuer desired to have it noted that the account, No. 94 of process, which bears that the warehouse rent was rendered to and discharged by Williams, is not in the handwriting of the collector to the Dock Commissioners, and is not admitted by them to have been rendered or discharged by any authorised official. The account, it may be explained, was not produced at the proof, but being called for was sent by Williams to the clerk of the process."

to be due to the defenders. It was enough that a debt due to the defenders was arrested.[1] That principle applied here.

Argued for the defenders;—The iron here in question was not in the actual possession of Ommundsen. The store of the Dock Commissioners might not be very elaborately managed, and they might run a considerable risk of giving out goods to the wrong person, but they could have refused to give up the iron to Ommundsen. It was in their possession, therefore not in his. At the most he was only constructively in possession, and in that case it was not enough to shew that the subjects said to have been arrested were the property of the defenders; it must also be shewn that the arrestee was under a liability to account for them to the defenders.[2] Here Ommundsen was under no liability to account to anyone. His connection with the iron ended when he put it into the store of the Commissioners. Any subsequent dealings which he had had with it were on separate and fresh instructions from Williams. It might be that he could have got it out of the store whenever he wished; but it was not enough to validate arrestments that the arrestee had de facto the power of getting access to the subjects alleged to have been arrested; he must have a legal right to the possession of them,[3] which Ommundsen, looking to his whole dealings with Williams, had not. But, admitting Ommundsen to have been constructively in possession, his liability to account was to Williams, and not to the defenders. The arrestments therefore had attached nothing due by the arrestee to the defenders. But, further, the iron was not, quoad the present question, the property of the defenders, for Williams, as the consignee under the bill of lading, was the legal owner, whatever rights the defenders had in equity;[4] and, even if it was the property of the defenders, it was not subject to arrestment by creditors, for it had been specially appropriated to Williams towards the extinction of the defenders' debt to his company.[5]

Lord President.—The question in this case is whether certain arrestments in the hands of Adolph Ommundsen, commission-agent, Bo'ness, were effectual to found jurisdiction against the defenders, whom I will call the Swedish company. It appears to me that there are two insuperable objections to these arrestments.

The first question which we have to consider is whether Ommundsen, the arrestee, was the debtor of, or accountable in any way to, the common debtor, the Swedish company, assuming that he was in possession of the iron. The second question is whether he was de facto in possession of the iron, and accountable for it to anyone whatever.

The first question depends entirely upon the relation which existed between the Swedish company and Ommundsen. Now, the evidence upon this subject is, I think, conclusive. The bill of lading for the iron was in possession of a Mr Williams on behalf of his company, which I may call the English company, and it appears to me that it gave him a right of property in the goods to which it refers for the purpose of a pro parte extinction of a debt due by the Swedish company to the English company. The Swedish company was largely indebted to the English company, and the bill of lading was not of sufficient value to extinguish that debt, or nearly so, but the price of the iron when sold was intended to be imputed towards the extinction of the debt. Now, that being so, it is difficult to understand how the relation of debtor and creditor could have subsisted between the supposed arrestee Ommundsen and the Swedish company, because if Ommundsen was in possession of the goods at all he was in possession for behoof of Williams and the English company, and was accountable to them, and to them alone. Therefore there could not possibly be the relation of debtor and creditor between the Swedish company and the arrestee. That appears to me to be the first, and at the same time a fatal and most insuperable objection to the arrestments.

But, in the second place, was Ommundsen really in possession of the iron at all, or accountable for it to anyone? His position seems to have been of this nature. He was employed as ship's broker by the captain of the ship which had brought the iron to Bo'ness, and after ascertaining that the iron belonged to Williams as representing the English company, he, Ommundsen, communicated with Williams asking how he proposed to take delivery. Williams distinctly replied,—"The iron belongs to me as representing the English company, and I desire you to take delivery of it, and store it." These are the instructions which Ommundsen received, and they are the instructions of the only person who had any right to the iron. What then did Ommundsen do? He sent the iron from the ship to the warehouse of the Bo'ness Harbour Commissioners, and there stored it, certainly not for himself (for he never pretended he had any right to it, nor had he de facto any right to it), but on behalf of Williams and under his instructions.

It is said that it was not a proper case of storage, and that the store of the Harbour Commissioners was not a regular store. I do not see the relevancy of that averment at all. The position of the Harbour Commissioners was just as independent as if they had been regular storekeepers. The goods when placed in their premises were under their lock and key, and could not have been removed without their authority, and they made a charge for storage. Then the question is, in whose custody or possession was the iron while under the lock and key of the Harbour Commissioners? That question, I think, admits of only one answer. It was in the custody and possession of the Harbour Commissioners for behoof of the English company, and no one was entitled to remove it out of that custody excepting the English company. It follows, therefore, of necessity that no arrestments could be effectually used in Ommundsen's hands. He never had any proper possession of the iron, for the only contact he had with it was while taking it from the ship under the instructions of the true owner and placing it in the warehouse to the orders of the true owner.

I think therefore that we must adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD ADAM.—It appears to me that the relation of debtor and creditor did not exist as between Ommundsen and the Swedish company, and in order to effectual arrestments that relation must subsist. The facts are these. The iron was sent to Bo'ness by the Swedish company to the English company, the former being indebted to the latter. In the bill of lading, accordingly, the iron is made deliverable to Williams, the agent of the English company. Intimation of the arrival of the iron having been made to Williams he sent the bill of lading to Ommundsen to get delivery of the iron, and Ommundsen took delivery, and having got possession of it he put it in the storehouse of the Harbour Commissioners according to his instructions. How could the receipt of the iron make Ommundsen liable to account for or deliver it to the Swedish company? He had no connection with the Swedish company whether the iron was in his possession or in the possession of the storekeepers. The only thing he had to do was to account to Williams, and to nobody else. No doubt there may have been questions of accounting between the English and the Swedish company, but what had Ommundsen to do with that? He had therefore no obligation to account to the Swedish company, and how in that case there could be the relation of debtor and creditor I am entirely unable to see. That is, in my opinion, sufficient for the decision of the case, and I agree that we ought to adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD M'LAREN.—The iron that is said to be arrested at the instance of the pursuer Mr Young came to this country under a bill of lading deliverable to John Williams of Birmingham, or to his order. Now, if this action had been at the instance of a creditor of Williams, and if Williams had entrusted the possession of the iron to Ommundsen, a question would have arisen, perhaps of some nicety, whether the iron was arrestable as in the possession of Ommundsen, or whether it was arrestable as in the possession of the Bo'ness Harbour Commissioners, because I conceive that an argument might be maintained that where a storekeeper is under an absolute and unqualified obligation to deliver to a person who has deposited goods with him, these goods may be held to be constructively in the possession of the depositor, and therefore arrestable in his hands. On the other side it would be said that it is a more convenient rule to hold that the goods are arrestable only in the hands of the person who is brought nearest to them, that is, who has actual physical possession of the goods. But it is unnecessary that we should give a decision upon this question, because the conditions necessary to raise it do not exist in this case. Here the raiser of the action is not a creditor of Williams, and Williams never entrusted the possession of this iron to Ommundsen. The only evidence we have as to the property of the iron in addition to what is disclosed by the bill of lading is the evidence of Mr Williams, who states that the iron was sent to him as secretary of an English company owning property in Sweden, in reduction of the debt due to it by the Swedish company. That admission seems to me in no way to qualify the proprietary title to the iron as disclosed by the bill of lading. On the other point, whether Ommundsen had such possession of the iron as would make it arrestable in his hands, I agree with your Lordship that Ommundsen was only employed for the performance of a particular service, viz., causing the iron to be warehoused to the order of Williams himself. That service being done, the employment came to an end, and the iron was never in Ommundsen's possession at all. It does not appear that Ommundsen thereafter acted otherwise than as a mere negotiator as to sales, or that he had authority to effect sales, but only to receive orders. Therefore, for the reasons given by the Lord Ordinary, and also in the view that the true possessor of the iron was Mr Williams or the English company which he represented, I am of opinion that no property has been attached in the hands of Ommundsen, and that the action ought to be dismissed.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. It is perfectly clear that the supposed arrestee here was under no obligation to deliver the goods said to have been arrested to the common debtor, or to account to the common debtor in any way for them. It therefore appears to me to follow that the arrestments were ineffectual.

Held that the rule of the common law that a debtor cannot be apprehended as being in meditatione fugæ if imprisonment is incompetent on account of the debt which he owes, applies to cases in which imprisonment has been rendered incompetent by the above Act.

Question (per Lord Justice-Clerk) whether such diligence could in any case be used in respect of a contingent debt.

Opinion (per Lord Young) that it could not. M'Gill v. Ferrier, March 9, 1838, 16 Sh. 934, doubted.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Stormonth Darling. I.

ON 13th November 1890 one of the Sheriff-substitutes for Kincardine (Brown) granted warrant to apprehend Joshua Hamilton Hart, "and to commit him to the prison of Aberdeen, therein to be detained until he find caution acted in the books of Court de judicio sisti in any action for payment of the debt mentioned in said petition to be brought against him at the pursuers' instance in any competent Court within one month from this date."

This warrant was granted on a petition by the testamentary trustees of the late John Anderson of Leithfield and Bridgeton, setting forth that Hart, by a missive of lease, dated 11th July 1890, had taken the house and shootings of Bridgeton, belonging to the petitioners, at a rent of £60 from 1st August to Martinmas 1890, and by a lease, dated in July and August 1890, agreed to take the same subjects on a lease for ten years from Martinmas 1890 at a rent of £125 per annum. The lease provided for a break in the option of either party after the third year.

They further stated that Hart had refused to pay the £60 due, or to give security for payment of the rent for the next ten years, and that they were about to raise an action against him for payment of the rent.

They then averred;—"The pursuers have been credibly informed, and in their conscience believe, that the defender is in meditatione fugæ, and about immediately to leave Scotland, and go to England, or elsewhere furth of Scotland, without making payment of the said rent, or making any provision for the due payment thereof, and the present proceedings have thus been rendered necessary."

After proof the Sheriff-substitute granted the warrant set forth above.

Hart, having been apprehended and put in prison on this warrant, brought a suspension "to suspend the said pretended warrant, and the whole grounds and warrants thereof, and to grant warrant for charging the Magistrates of Aberdeen and the keeper of the said prison to set the complainer at liberty." He set forth the procedure stated above, denying that he was in meditatione fugæ, and stating that when he was apprehended he was in course of making arrangements for payment of £60. After his incarceration a bond of caution for £60 was tendered by his agent.

He pleaded;—(1) The whole proceedings complained of, and the warrant of incarceration, ought to be set aside, in respect that the debt in question being liquid, and the respondents being empowered by the terms of the said lease to charge the complainer to pay any sums due by him, they were not entitled to apply for or obtain the fugæ warrant under suspension. (2) The complainer not having been in meditatione fugæ, and it not being proved that he was, the warrant of imprisonment ought to be suspended. (3) The said warrant ought to be suspended, in respect of the said offers of payment and caution referred to in statements. (4) Generally the whole proceedings complained of being irregular, unwarrantable, and oppressive, ought to be set aside, with expenses.

The respondents pleaded;—(4) The complainer having been in meditatione fugæ, and the warrant complained of having been regularly granted and regularly enforced, the said warrant is not subject to suspension, and the note should be refused.

The Lord Ordinary (Stormonth Darling), on 24th November, refused the note.*

The complainer reclaimed, and argued;—The case of M'Gill did not

* "NOTE.—The complainer has been imprisoned as in meditatione fugæ on a warrant to commit him to the prison of Aberdeen, 'therein to be detained until he find caution acted in the books of Court de judicio sisti in any action for payment of the debt mentioned in said petition to be brought against him at the pursuers' instance in any competent Court within one month from this date' (15th November). The debt mentioned in the petition consists (1) of £60 of rent for the house and shootings of Bridgeton from 1st August to Martinmas last; and (2) of rent at the rate of £125 per annum under a current lease of the same subjects for ten years from Martinmas last.

"There can be no doubt of the landlord's right to sue at once for the first of these debts; I should have thought that he had no right to sue (within a month) for the second,—were it not for the judgment of the whole Court in the case of M'Gill v. Ferrier, March 9, 1838, 16 S. 934 (10 Scot. Jur. 418), in which it was held by a majority that an application by a landlord against a tenant under a nineteen years' lease, which had fifteen years still to run, to have the tenant imprisoned as in meditatione fugæ till he found caution de judicio sisti to the amount of the whole future rents of the lease, the terms of payment being first come and bygone, was competent and legal. Professor Bell in his Principles, section 1232 (c), expresses his disapprobation of this decision, and both the writers on the law of landlord and tenant agree with him (Hunter, ii. 349; Rankine, 318, note 13). My own opinion is in accord with theirs, but I feel myself bound to follow the decision, especially as if I granted liberation I should be defeating the landlord's diligence, without the possibility of effectual redress by way of reclaiming note. This might be the case even as regards the portion of the debt which is admittedly due, for if the warrant is bad as regards part of the debt, it is probably bad altogether (Garrioch v. Wilson, 1851, 13 D. 1377, 23 Scot. Jur. 639; M'Cubbin v. Fulton, 1852, 14 D. 908, 24 Scot. Jur. 543).

"The complainer has a separate point, for which there is a good deal to be said, viz., that the formal lease under which he now holds the subjects contains the usual clause of consent to registration for execution, and that under this the landlord is entitled to charge him for payment of the rent due and unpaid at any term without the necessity of raising any action. But if M'Gill v. Ferrier is to be held as good law, it would seem to give the landlord a larger and earlier right of action, and therefore I do not feel justified in the face of that judgment in sustaining this plea to the effect of holding the warrant illegal."

apply, for there was a break here at the end of the third year of the lease, so that in any event no caution could be asked for rent beyond that period. There must be an unconditional obligation for rent in order to let in the authority of M'Gill's case. But, secondly, the law had altered since 1838: imprisonment on account of civil debt was no longer competent;* and if imprisonment for debt was incompetent then apprehension of the debtor with a view to eventual imprisonment,—the view upon which med. fug. warrants proceeded,—was also incompetent.[1] The exception of fugæ warrants in the Act did not touch the common law, by which an inquiry had always been necessary to see if the remedy of imprisonment was available to the creditor for recovery of his debt. If, for instance, the debt was so small that imprisonment was incompetent, so was a med. fug. warrant.[2] The meaning of the statute was to save fugæ warrants for debts where imprisonment was still competent, e.g. debts due to Her Majesty. It was said on the other side that the warrant was a means of detaining the debtor till an action should be served on him, but he was a tenant of Scots heritage, and therefore amenable to the jurisdiction, and as the lease contained a consent to registration for execution no action was necessary.

The respondents' counsel stated at the outset of his argument in answer to the Court that he was willing to accept the £60 in full of his claims, if the complainer would renounce his lease, but the complainer's counsel stated that he had no instructions to pay anything. The respondents then argued;—The case was then to be taken on the footing, in spite of the complainer's statement in his petition, that he either could not or would not pay anything. It was therefore obvious that action would have to be raised against him, and it might be necessary to sequestrate him. Now, there would be no jurisdiction against him in the Sheriff Court for the former purpose on the simple fact of his being a tenant of heritage,[3] and, if he was not present in the territory of Scotland or carrying on business there, sequestration might be impossible. Hence there was a plain interest in the creditors to keep their debtor in Scotland, even although they could no longer imprison him after judgment in a petitory action. The present case, therefore, was not ruled by Kidd's case,[4] for there the creditor held an extract decree, and had therefore parata executio; hence the presence of his debtor in the territory could profit him nothing. Again, it was said that the debt was contingent, but that argument had been rejected in M'Gill's case, since the landlord might have found another tenant there, in which case no rent would have been due, or right to it might have been lost in respect of a damnum fatale. But the remedy had been allowed in a case where the contingency was much greater,[4] being the contingency as to the birth of a bastard then in utero, and its survivance for the whole period of liability. On the general question, the Statute of 1880 reserved fugæ warrants. The Act was not to affect them, but if the complainer's argument was allowed to prevail, the foundation of nine-tenths of such warrants was cut away by this Act, which professed not to affect them. The saving clause was in reality a substantive enactment.[1]

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The warrant on which the complainer is detained is in these terms,—"To apprehend" the complainer "and to commit him to the prison of Aberdeen, therein to be detained until he find caution acted in the books of Court de judicio sisti in any action for payment of the debt mentioned in said petition to be brought against him at the pursuers' instance in any competent Court within one month from this date."

The petition states that the defender has failed to pay £60 of rent due at Martinmas 1890, and that he has failed to give security for payment of the rent of £125 for the next ten years.

The question which arises is, whether that warrant was a competent warrant in the circumstances. Objection is taken to it on two grounds. The first objection is, that the obligation is an obligation for a contingent debt for the subsequent years. The other objection is, that no such warrant is competent in reference to an action on a claim of debt of this kind in consequence of the provisions of 43 and 44 Vict. c. 34.

The respondent supported his right to have the warrant granted against the former objection by reference to the case of M'Gill v. Ferrier, a case decided by the whole Court by a majority of ten Judges to three, in which a warrant for a contingent debt was held to be competent, and that case was followed up by more than one case, and particularly one in which the contingency was with reference to the birth and survivance of a child, of which the person apprehended was said to be the father.

If we had to consider that question, I confess I should have great difficulty in following either of these decisions. It is, however, highly undesirable to express any opinion against that of the majority of the Judges on that point, unless it is necessary to do so.

Let us see, then, what decision must be given on the other point. Did the Act of Parliament of 1880 authorise, or did it not authorise such a warrant as we have here?

Now, the fourth clause of that Act abolishes imprisonment on account of civil debt, but it makes certain exceptions, viz., "taxes, fines, or penalties due to Her Majesty, and rates and assessments lawfully imposed, or to be imposed," and also "sums decerned for aliment." The same clause provides,—"Nothing contained in this Act shall affect or prevent the apprehension or imprisonment of any person under a warrant granted against him as being in meditatione fugæ, or under any decree or obligation ad factum præstandum."

Now, that provision comes in in a very peculiar way, and the question is, what did it mean? It is impossible to hold that it meant anything but that a warrant in meditatione fugæ was in future to be competent in such cases as those in which it was then competent. That takes us back to the law which was established before the passing of that Act, i.e., that warrants could only be granted in cases in which a creditor could make good his claim after obtaining judgment, by following that up by a charge and imprisoning his debtor. If a person against whom such a claim could be so enforced were shewn to be likely to leave the country, and so to deprive the creditor of that compulsitor, the creditor was entitled to a warrant till caution should be found, the cautioner being bound either to produce the debtor or to pay the debt himself. I do not think that the Act of 1880 was meant to go beyond that. Under the former law if the creditor's claim were not such as could result in imprisonment, then no warrant as in meditatione fugæ could issue. That law is not altered by the statute, it is only saved.

As regards the excepted cases—debts of a particular kind—he can still use this warrant, but to hold it to mean anything more would make the clause an enacting clause to the effect of enabling the creditor now to use a meditatio fugæ warrant for some other purpose than was sanctioned by the old law, for it was admitted that there was no case under the old law where such a warrant was granted to facilitate citation, or to enable a charge to be given. It was not questioned here that if the creditor is successful in his action, and obtains judgment, he will have, and can have, under this statute no power of incarcerating his debtor; that, which was the only ground for granting the warrant, is taken from him, and he has therefore no right to the warrant. I am therefore for suspending these proceedings.

LORD YOUNG.—We are asked to suspend the warrant here on a variety of grounds. The suspender has stated four pleas in law. I am not prepared to sustain any of them. The ground which your Lordship has taken was argued on a suggestion from the bench, and I think it is a good ground for judgment, but it was not put forward by the suspender.

If it were necessary to go into it, I should hold that the case of M'Gill was not well decided, and, if we had to consider it, I should have no great scruple or hesitation in going against that judgment, even although it was a judgment of the whole Court. It was not a unanimous judgment, it was given fifty-two years ago, and since that time it has been condemned by eminent text writers. Besides, a great deal has happened since.

But it is not necessary here to follow that case or to take it into consideration. The language of the Act of 1880 is perplexing, and at first sight it affords room for this strict logical reading,—"You are founding on the act of 1880 as rendering such a warrant illegal, but the Act says that nothing contained in it is to affect fugæ warrants; therefore, if all you can say is that there is something in that Act that is fatal to them, you are precluded from referring to it, and they must therefore stand as they did before." That argument, I think, is fallacious. It is not intended to alter the law as it existed in respect of fugæ warrants. The intention was to leave the law of fugæ warrants as it was. If there had been an intention to alter that law, other words would have been used.

Now the law of fugæ warrants was and is, unless the Act of 1880 has altered it, that these warrants were incidental and accessory to imprisonment. The law gave, directly or indirectly, the remedy of imprisonment to creditors; that was a remedy against the person of the debtor. A fugæ warrant was a precautionary measure, allowed to the creditor, where the debtor shewed signs of an intention to withdraw his person from the operation of that remedy. Accordingly it was decided, in Marshall's case, 7 D. 232, where the debt was under the amount for which the remedy of imprisonment was competent, that the incidental and accessory remedy of a fugæ warrant could not be allowed.

Now, did the Act of 1880 change that? It would require a positive enactment to do so, and there is no such enactment. These words must receive a reasonable interpretation. I put as an illustration a hypothetical case that some particular class of debts had been by that Act declared to be no longer recoverable. If a fugæ warrant had been applied for in connection with a debt of that class, the same strict logical argument would have been available, but to sustain such a plea would have involved an absurdity. We must pay attention to the good sense of the thing. There is no longer any remedy to the creditor against the person of the debtor, therefore I think the person of the debtor is not to be detained and secured till the debt is constituted, for when it has been constituted nothing can be done against the person of the debtor so secured.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am of the same opinion. I have already explained my views in the case of Kidd, and I need not repeat what I then said. I hold that by the common law a meditatione fugæ warrant can only be used as a means of enabling the creditor to use diligence against the person of his debtor, and therefore that it cannot be used for any purpose where such diligence is incompetent. It was argued that the Act of 1880 enlarges the right of the creditor so as to enable him to use this warrant for purposes for which it could not be used before. I do not think that the argument is sound. The statute enacts nothing. It merely reserves.

LORD TRAYNER.—I concur in the proposed judgment on the grounds stated by Lord Young. I concur in what he has said in criticism of the terms of the Act of 1880, and I am therefore for suspending these proceedings.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor reclaimed against, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to grant the prayer of the note.

A petition to the Court of Session for the amendment of a scheme in which provision had been made, in terms of section 20, for its alteration, set forth that, at the time of the passing of the scheme, one teacher had been receiving a pension from the trustees who were superseded by the Governors, that a second was old and infirm; and that a third had lost her appointment through the passing of the scheme, and that the Governors desired to have power to continue the pension to the first, to make a retiring allowance to the second, and to grant compensation to the third. Held (dub. Lord M'Laren) that the petition was truly an application for power to make payments to certain persons, and not for an alteration of the scheme of the nature contemplated by the Act, and that it could not be granted.

1ST DIVISION. C.

DOLLAR INSTITUTION, or John M'Nabb's School, was administered at the date of the passing of the Educational Endowments (Scotland) Act, 1882, by a body of trustees under the Act 10 and 11 Vict. cap. 16. On 25th March 1887 a scheme for the management of the school, prepared by the Educational Endowments Commissioners under the above recited Act, came into operation. Prior to that date, the trustees had been in use to grant pensions as seemed fit to their teachers, although they had no special powers to do so. There was no provision in the scheme for payment of pensions or retiring allowances to teachers.

The old trustees were empowered by the scheme to continue to exercise all necessary acts of administration relative to the endowment, and to have all powers necessary therefor until the first meeting of the Governors under the scheme, and acting under these powers the trustees, at a meeting held on 4th July 1887 (the Governors not having all been elected at that date), resolved to give a pension to a Miss Crombie who had been for thirty-three years one of the teachers in the institution. The pension was paid by the Governors under the scheme, but at the audit of their accounts exception was taken to the payment, and it was disallowed. On appeal to the Scottish Education Department the payment was allowed. Subsequently Miss Crombie's case, and those of Mr Douglas, a teacher, who had been for thirty-nine years in the service of the institution, and who was unable from old age and ill health to perform his duties, but was receiving a reduced salary, and of Miss Snowdoune, who had been twenty-five years in one of the schools which was discontinued by the scheme, were referred to the Education Department, who suggested to the Governors to present an application to the Court of Session under section 51 of the scheme, which provided for alteration of the scheme, in terms of sec. 20 of the Educational Endowments Act, 1882 (quoted in the rubric).

The Governors then applied to the Scotch Education Department for their consent to an application to the Court of Session under sec. 51 of the scheme. The Department gave their consent to the application, "but only on the express understanding that such consent is given not as implying any opinion on the subject of the application."

The Governors accordingly presented a petition to the First Division of the Court of Session, the prayer of which was,—"to amend the scheme of the Educational Endowments (Scotland) Commission passed for the administration of the endowment known as the Dollar Institution, or John M'Nabb's School, in the parish of Dollar, and county of Clackmannan, in order to make it applicable to the cases of Miss Crombie, Mr Douglas, and Miss Snowdoune, by adding at the end of section 24 of said scheme the following clauses:—'Provided that (a) such pensions as may have been granted by the trustees of Dollar Institution, appointed by Act of Parliament, 1847 (10 and 11 Vict. cap. 16), are and shall continue to be a burden on the trust; provided also that (b) the Governors shall have power to grant a retiring allowance to such teachers as had served the trust for a long period, and were found to be old and infirm at the passing of the scheme; and provided also that (c) the Governors shall have power to grant compensation to such teachers as may have lost their appointments through the passing of this scheme.'"

It was stated in the petition;—"While the proposed amendment is here stated in general terms, the Governors, the petitioners, only desire your Lordships' authority to dispose under it of—under clause (a) the case of Miss Crombie; under clause (b) the case of Mr Douglas; and under clause (c) the case of Miss Snowdoune. That the petitioners are not contending for the general principle of power to compensate or pension, but only desire your Lordships' authority to deal with the cases stated."

The First Division remitted the petition to Mr George Gillespie, advocate, to inquire and report.

The report bore that the three individual cases in question were most deserving, and proper for the granting of such pensions as were proposed, and that there were ample funds to meet them. The subjoined extract gives the reporter's views upon the competency of the application.*

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—We are asked to exercise a jurisdiction which is conferred upon us by the 20th section of the Educational Endowments Act of 1882, which provides that "in any scheme the Commissioners may provide for the alteration of the scheme, from time to time, by the Court of Session, upon application made, with the consent of the Scotch Education Department, by the governing body or any party interested, provided that such alteration shall not be contrary to anything contained in this Act." It appears to me that our jurisdiction in the matter is entirely a statutory jurisdiction, and that we cannot go

* "I hardly think that the present application is an application of the character which the Legislature expected to be made under the 20th section. What seems to have been contemplated by that section was a permanent alteration in the scheme of management of the institution, or of the constitution of the governing body, which experience had been found to recommend. There is no such alteration sought here; all that is asked is that the Court shall grant special powers of a temporary nature for certain particular cases. Now, that being so, it is not to be expected that the proposal should be contrary to anything contained in the Act, in the sense of being forbidden by any of its provisions. Had there been a provision proposed for giving the Governors a general power of awarding pensions in the future, that would have raised a general question of principle, on which some instruction could be got from the Act, but there is no such proposal here.

"I may be allowed to refer to the practice of the Commissioners in framing schemes under the Act, that the Court may be aware of their views as to what the spirit of the Act allowed. After consultation with the Scottish Education Department, they refused, except in a few special cases, to give a general power of pensioning, or to sanction payment of pensions to teachers who were then in office, but who might be found by the new governing bodies to have become inefficient, and who might, for the sake of the school, require to be dismissed. On the other hand, where a school, or a department of a school, was shut up by a scheme, and an efficient teacher thereby deprived of his or her support, the Commissioners almost invariably made such compensation, temporarily or permanently, as the funds would permit, to the person so dispossessed; and in cases where the endowment was small, and could not afford to pay a pension, they sometimes suspended the operation of the scheme until the teacher should cease to hold office. . . ."

beyond the letter of the statute. The argument which was addressed to us was a good deal founded upon considerations of equity, and upon the impoverished circumstances and want of means of the persons on whose behalf the application is made. But I am very much afraid that such elements are excluded by the terms of the clause of the Act which I have quoted. The Scottish Education Department have given their consent to the presenting of the application, but they have done so only under considerable reservation. They suggest that the Governors, "if persuaded of the necessity of such payments, should consider whether it would be well to proceed under section 51 of the scheme. But my Lords must, of course, reserve their own judgment in regard to any such proposal until it is before them." Then, upon a subsequent occasion, the Secretary of the Education Department writes,—"I am to inform you that my Lords are now prepared to give their consent to the governing body making an application to the Court of Session in terms of section 51 of the scheme, but only on the express understanding that such consent is given, not as implying any opinion on the subject of the application, but only in order that the question may be duly submitted to the judgment of the Court." Section 51 of the scheme, to which reference is made, is in identical terms with the 20th section of the Act of Parliament.

The petitioners explain that the object of the application is to obtain confirmation of a decision which was arrived at at a meeting of the governors on the 17th May 1887, and again on 4th July of the same year, at which it was resolved that "Miss Crombie, for thirty-three years one of the teachers in the institution, should receive a pension of £25 per annum on account of her long and faithful services." When the term of payment came the governors paid it. At the audit of their accounts exception was taken to this payment, and it was disallowed by the auditor. On appeal, however, to the Scotch Education Department, the payment was allowed, but the governors were informed that they must furnish the Department with a legal opinion in favour of the course pursued before any future liabilities of the kind objected to were created. The case came up again later, and was again brought under notice of the Education Department, who replied that before the question of remitting the disallowances (especially as regards the pension to Miss Crombie) could be disposed of, they would require to have a legal opinion on the question. An opinion by counsel unfavourable to the Governors was furnished to the Department, who replied in the terms which I have already quoted. It is made very clear upon the face of the petition that their object is to be enabled to make payment to certain individuals and to alter their scheme to that effect and no further. It is said that besides the case of Miss Crombie there are other two cases. In the first place, there is the case of Mr Douglas, about whom there is this statement,—"This is the case of a teacher who has been for thirty-nine years a faithful servant of the said institution, and who has not resigned, but has been compelled from old age and ill-health to cease from active work." It is proposed to continue to pay him his salary and to appoint another teacher to do his work. There is also the case of Miss Snowdoune, about which it is stated,—"This is the case of a teacher who has been for twenty-five years in the service of the said institution, being teacher in the Sheardale school, which belonged to and was under the administration of the said Dollar Institution Trustees. That the said school was discontinued under and by virtue of the provisions specified in section 22 of the said scheme, and the services of Miss Snowdoune were therefore dispensed with."

No. 35.

Governors of Dollar Institution.

What is proposed in regard to her is to give her "a sum equal to three years' salary, in respect of her long and faithful services, and the position in which she has unfortunately been placed owing to the operation of the said scheme."

The petition further bears that "while the proposed amendment is here stated in general terms, the Governors, the petitioners, only desire your Lordships' authority to dispose under it of—under clause (a) the case of Miss Crombie; under clause (b) the case of Mr Douglas; and under clause (c) the case of Miss Snowdoune. Thus the petitioners are not contending for the general principle of power to compensate or pension, but only desire your Lordships' authority to deal with the cases stated." The proposal therefore is to amend the scheme of the Endowment Commissioners, and to make it applicable to the cases I have mentioned by the addition of clauses making these pensions a burden on the trust. It is plain, therefore, as I have said, that the whole object of the application is limited to the purpose of enabling the Governors to deal with these three cases, and they desire to go no further.

It occurred to me when the case was argued that this was not really a competent proceeding under the 20th section of the Act, because it was not an alteration which would have a general effect, but only for the purpose of enabling the Governors to make payments to particular individuals which they had no power to do otherwise.

We have before us a very useful and suggestive report from Mr Gillespie—one passage in which I should like to quote. Mr Gillespie says,—"I hardly think that the present application is an application of the character which the Legislature expected to be made under that section. What seems to have been contemplated by that section was a permanent alteration in the scheme of management of the institution, or of the constitution of the governing body, which experience had been found to recommend. There is no such alteration sought here; all that is asked is that the Court shall grant special powers of a temporary nature for certain particular cases. Now, that being so, it is not to be expected that the proposal should be contrary to anything contained in the Act, in the sense of being forbidden by any of its provisions. Had there been a provision proposed for giving the Governors a general power of awarding pensions in the future, that would have raised a general question of principle." I entirely adopt the view which Mr Gillespie takes. I think this is not an application for the purpose of obtaining a general power of awarding pensions, and if any proposal be made to have a general pension fund created, there may be very good reason for considering such a scheme upon its merits. But the present application is one brought under colour of the statute in order to obtain confirmation of a proposal to give certain pensions to individuals which otherwise the Governors have no power to bestow.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—I have doubts in regard to the proposed decision, and incline to the view that the powers of the Court are as wide as those of the Endowed School Commission. But I do not wish to be understood as dissenting in this individual case.

LORD KINNEAR concurred with the LORD PRESIDENT.

THE COURT accordingly refused the petition.

Company—Winding-up—Prosecution by liquidator of action raised by third party—Sanction of Court.—An action was raised by the trustee in a sequestration in the interests and on the guarantee of a company registered under the Companies Acts. The defender in these actions was assoilzied, with expenses, in the Outer-House, and the pursuer reclaimed. Thereafter a winding-up order was pronounced, and the liquidator of the company petitioned the Court to sanction the prosecution of the reclaiming note by him either in his own name or in that of the original pursuer, and in the latter case to approve of his guaranteeing the pursuer his expenses. The liquidator stated that he had been advised by counsel that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary was such as ought to be brought under review. The Court authorised the liquidator to prosecute the reclaiming note in his own name, holding that having obtained the opinion of counsel he was justified in insisting in the reclaiming note, but that, as an officer of Court, he ought to be master of the process.

1st DIVISION. C.

THE estates of John Richardson, a shareholder in the Property Investment Company of Scotland, Limited, were sequestrated in April 1889 upon the petition of the company, who had obtained decree against Richardson for £660, being the amount of unpaid calls due upon his shares, and had charged upon the decree. Mr William Albert Davis was appointed trustee in the sequestration.

In March 1890 the trustee raised actions against Richardson's wife and the representatives of his daughter, for the purpose of having alienations of property by him in favour of his wife and daughter set aside on the ground that they had been granted in order that he might evade payment of his calls due to the company.

These actions were truly raised on behalf of the company, who were Richardson's chief creditors, the only other claims in the sequestration being one for £3, 3s. 2d., and a contingent claim for £400 by another company in respect of future calls on shares held by Richardson.

Previously to the raising of the actions the manager of the company gave the following letter of guarantee to the trustee in the sequestration:—"On behalf of this company I hereby undertake, in the event of your raising proceedings to reduce the deeds granted by the bankrupt, and generally to ingather the sequestrated estates in terms of the creditors' instructions, to keep you skaithless of all responsibility and liability in the premises, including relief from all disbursements you may personally make in case of there being no funds in the sequestration ingathered by you from which you can obtain payment and relief. I also agree to pay you the usual fee for your trouble as the same shall be fixed by the commissioners, should no funds be ingathered by you."

On 25th and 29th July 1890 the defenders in the actions were assoilzied, with expenses.

The trustee reclaimed.

On 29th July 1890 a winding-up order was pronounced by the Court, Mr R. C. Millar being appointed liquidator of the company. Power was conferred on the liquidator to exercise the powers conferred by the 95th section of the Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 89).

On 6th November 1890 the liquidator presented this petition, in which, after narrating the foregoing circumstances, he stated,—"The official liquidator on entering upon his duties consulted counsel in reference to said proceedings and his duty in the circumstances, and he was advised that he might either move to be sisted as pursuer in room of the trustee in the sequestration, or might give the trustee a further indemnity for expenses, but that, in the former case, he must undertake to relieve the trustee of all expenses already incurred, and that, in the latter, the trustee was entitled to require that the official liquidator should undertake to relieve him of all expenses, both incurred and to be incurred, in the said actions, so that in either case the trustee might, in the event of a deficiency of funds to meet the whole claims against the company, which the official liquidator anticipated may occur to some extent, obtain a virtual preference for the expenses incurred by him prior to the date of the liquidation. At present the trustee has no preference over the other creditors of the company for these expenses. The expenses of both sides in said actions, to the date of the liquidation, are estimated to amount to £300. The official liquidator is advised by counsel that the judgments of the Lord Ordinary are such as ought to be brought under review of the Inner-House by reclaiming note; but that his power to guarantee the expenses of an action carried on, not in the name of the company, but in another name in its interest, with the possible consequence of incurring liability for expenses already incurred, is so doubtful as to render it proper for him to lay the circumstances before your Lordships, and ask special direction as to the course which he should adopt. Having full regard to the pecuniary issues at stake, the official liquidator is of opinion that in the interests of the company and its creditors a reclaiming note against the said judgments should be prosecuted."

The petitioner therefore prayed the Court "to sanction the prosecuting by the official liquidator of said reclaiming notes, either in his own name or in name of the said William Albert Davis, as trustee on the sequestrated estates of the said John Richardson, and in the latter case to approve of the official liquidator giving the said William Albert Davis a guarantee or indemnity for expenses of the said actions incurred and to be incurred or in such other form as your Lordships may direct."

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Court are of opinion that, having obtained the opinion of counsel advising the prosecution of these reclaiming notes, the official liquidator is well justified in proceeding to take them up. But we are also of opinion that this must be done in name of the official liquidator and not in that of the trustee in the sequestration.

The official liquidator must be master of the process, and, as the officer of the Court, the reclaiming notes must be taken up in his own name. This will involve relieving the trustee in the sequestration of the expense of the previous proceedings, but that, I presume, is a matter of course.

We shall therefore grant the prayer of the note, and sanction the prosecution by the official liquidator of the reclaiming notes in his own name.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel for the official liquidator on the note by him, No. 31 of process, no answers for William Albert Davis, trustee on the sequestrated estates of John Richardson, mentioned in the note, having been lodged, sanction the prosecution by said liquidator of reclaiming notes against the interlocutors of Lord Trayner, dated 25th and 29th July 1890, in the actions mentioned in the note, and decern."

Succession—Conditio si sine liberis decesserit.—Where one member of a class which has been instituted to a bequest has died before the date of the settlement, the conditio will not apply in favour of the children of that member.

A testator died leaving a settlement in which he bequeathed a legacy "to the lawful children of my now deceased sister Mary." The residue of his estate he directed to be divided among his brothers and sisters by name, the children of his deceased sister Mary, and two nephews by name, sons of another deceased sister. The settlement was dated four months before the testator's death, and one of his sister Mary's children had died fifteen years previously leaving children. Held that these children were not entitled to any share of the legacy or of the residue bequeathed to Mary's children.

2D DIVISION. Lord Trayner. M.

THE late Hector Morrison, who died in October 1888, left a deed of settlement dated 4th June of that year, by which he directed his trustees, inter alia, "to pay to the lawful children of my now deceased sister, Mary Morrison or Macdonald," a legacy of £1000; and farther, with regard to the residue of his estate, he directed that it should be paid to his brothers Donald and Neil, his sister Mrs M'Rory, the children of his deceased sister Mrs Macdonald, his sister Mrs M'Millan, and his nephews Murdoch and Farquhar M'Lennan "in such shares proportionate to the legacies bequeathed to each of them as before mentioned."

The testator's sister, Mrs Mary Macdonald, had nine children, one of whom, Mrs Margaret Macdonald, died in 1873, thus predeceasing the date of the truster's settlement by a period of about fifteen years.

A multiplepoinding was raised by Morrison's trustees to determine whether Margaret Macdonald's children were entitled to take a share of the bequest of £1000, and of the residue left to the "children" of their grandmother Mary Macdonald. Counter claims were lodged by the other legatees interested in the settlement.

Lord Trayner (Ordinary) repelled the claim of Margaret's children, and ranked and preferred the other claimants in terms of their claim.*

* "NOTE— . . . A good deal might have been said in favour of this claim, looking to the liberality with which the conditio has been applied in recent years, had Mrs Margaret Macdonald been alive at the date of the settlement. But as she was then dead (a fact of which the testator is not said to have been ignorant), and was not therefore one of the persons instituted to the legacy, I think there is no room for the application of the maxim which sets up an implied conditional institution. 'There must be a legatee instituted in the first instance, otherwise there can be no conditional institution either under the express terms of the deed or under the implied condition' (per Lord Cowan in Rhind's Trustees, Dec. 5, 1866, 5 Macph. 109, 39 Scot. Jur. 120). The law appears to be settled against the validity of a claim made under circumstances similar to those I am now dealing with,—Wishart, 1763, M. 2310; Sturrock, Nov. 29, 1843, 6 D. 117, 16 Scot. Jur. 100; and Rhind's Trustees, supra, M'Laren on Wills, &c., i. 489. There is this farther view against any supposed or implied intention on the part of the testator to favour the present claimants, that he specially provided for the case of two nephews, while he made no provision for the present claimants, whose mother, the testator's niece, had died. The grounds on which I have held that the claimants are not entitled to any share of the legacy equally exclude them from any share of the residue."

No. 37.

Nov. 29, 1890. Morrison's Trustees v. Macdonalds.

The unsuccessful claimants reclaimed, and argued;—It mattered not that one child of the family was dead; the whole family was instituted as a class, and took either directly or by representation in the person of the children of one deceased. That was the principle of the conditio; the person originally favoured must in every case be dead before the testator, who nevertheless did not provide for that event; that the death occurred before the date when the will was made was of no consequence, for every will spoke a morte testatoris. The Lord Ordinary's decision was not supported by the authorities cited. Wishart's case was simply a case as to the interpretation of the word "children." In Rhind's case the testator did not stand in loco parentis to the favoured family, and the family there were substitutes, not institutes as here.

The Court did not call for a reply.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think both principle and authority, particularly the authority of Rhind's Trustees, are against this claim.

Bankruptcy—Sequestration—Contingent Debt—Claim for expenses in litigation—Decree for interim execution pending appeal—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. 79), sec. 14.—The 14th section of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, enacts:—"Petitions for sequestration may be at the instance . . . of any one creditor whose debt amounts to not less than £50, or of any two creditors whose debts together amount to not less than £70 . . . whether such debts are liquid or illiquid, provided they are not contingent."

Held that a claim for the expenses of a Court of Session action for which the successful party had obtained decree for interim execution pending an appeal by his opponent to the House of Lords, was a "contingent" debt, and could not therefore support a petition for sequestration under the above enactment.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Kyllachy. C.

(VIDE ante, 17 R. 895.)

In an action of reduction raised by George Whyte residing in Aberdeen against Simon Forbes, distiller, Peterhead, the Lord Ordinary on 9th July 1889 dismissed the action and found the pursuer liable in expenses. On a reclaiming note, the First Division adhered on 11th June 1890, and found the pursuer liable in additional expenses.

Whyte having appealed against these judgments to the House of Lords, Forbes presented a petition for interim execution pending appeal founding upon the 17th section of the Act 48 Geo. III. c. 151, quoted infra in the opinion of the Lord President.

On 16th July the Court ordained Whyte to pay Forbes the sum of £129, 18s. 10d. as the taxed amount of the expenses of the action and of the dues of extract, allowed the decree to go out and be extracted and execution to proceed thereon notwithstanding the appeal by the pursuer and that upon caution in common form to repeat the same in the event of the interlocutors being reversed in the House of Lords, and further granted warrant to messengers-at-arms to charge Whyte for payment upon the decree and to arrest his goods in payment of the said sum, and if Whyte failed to obey the charge to poind his goods.

Nov. 29, 1890. Forbes v. Whyte.

On 1st September Forbes found caution, and having extracted the decree, he presented a petition for sequestration of Whyte's estates in terms of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, founding upon the debt due to him under the above decree. He stated that Whyte was notour bankrupt.

On 21st October, the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) refused the petition for sequestration and decerned.*

The petitioner reclaimed, and argued;—The debt in the present case was entirely different in kind and character from the familiar instances of "contingent" debt. Such were claims of unliquidated damages,[1] or cases where a person was bound as cautioner in an obligation[2] and in which it was obvious that the debt was contingent so far as he was concerned until the principal made default. Here the debt was presently due and was duly constituted by a decree of the Court which set out that diligence and execution were to proceed upon it. Sequestration was just a form of diligence following out the decree, and was equivalent to poinding and other modes of execution against a debtor's estate.[3]

The Court did not call upon the respondent.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I do not think it is necessary to call for any answer here. The question seems to me to be simply whether the debt upon which the petitioner has applied for sequestration is a contingent debt.

Now, it is a claim arising under a deliverance of this Court pronounced under the 17th section of the Administration of Justice Act of 1808, which provides that "when any appeal is lodged in the House of Lords a copy of the petition of appeal shall be laid by the respondent or respondents before the Judges of the Division to which the cause belongs, and the said Division, or any four of the Judges, thereof shall have power to regulate all matters relative to interim possession or execution and payment of costs and expenses already incurred, according to their sound discretion, having a just regard to the interests of the parties as they may

* "NOTE.—The petitioning creditor's debt consists of a claim for the expenses of an action in the Court of Session, for which expenses he has obtained decree, which decree is under appeal to the House of Lords. In such circumstances, the Lord Ordinary cannot doubt that the petitioner's debt is prima facie contingent, and as such cannot found a petition for sequestration.

"The petitioner, however, maintains that, having petitioned the Court for interim execution pending appeal, and having obtained an order for such interim execution, his debt is put in the same position as if it were absolute. In short, he states that the Court, by allowing decree to go out and to be extracted, and execution to proceed thereon, have impliedly authorised sequestration under the Bankrupt Statutes. The Lord Ordinary has given careful consideration to this argument, but he is unable to give effect to it. The process of sequestration is not, in his opinion, a process of execution within the meaning of the Court's order. Although it has in certain respects the effect of a diligence, it is primarily a process of distribution, and is not in any proper sense a process of execution employed by the petitioning creditor for the recovery of his debt.

"On the whole, the Lord Ordinary considers that he must refuse the sequestration. He may add that it was admitted at the discussion that no instance can be found of sequestration following upon an order for interim execution pending appeal."

be affected by the affirmance or reversal of the judgment or decree appealed from."

This certainly leaves a very large discretion in the hands of the Court. Nothing is said about requiring bonds of caution for repayment in the event of decree being allowed to go out for payment of costs. In short it is left in the hands of the Court to decide what are to be the conditions on which any order is to be made.

It appears to me that the rational way to look at the present question is to ask one's self whether if an application had been made at the time when the petition for interim execution was presented to allow the party to apply for sequestration, it would have been granted. That would have depended entirely on whether the debt constituted by the order for interim execution is a contingent debt or not, and the same question arises now when we come to consider what effect is to be given to the order then made.

Now, it appears to me to be almost beyond the possibility of a doubt that the debt is a contingent debt. Contingency may be of this nature that the debt may never become due or payable. But one can quite understand that though the debt may not become absolutely due it may be payable ad interim, which is the position of the present debt.

It is not very easy to conceive cases arising under the ordinary operation of the law illustrating what I say, but I think the position of the debt may be illustrated by cases of special agreement, such as are often before us in the transactions of companies, the purchase and sale of estates for company purposes, where you find parties taken bound to pay a sum of money. In certain events the money will revert to them, and in certain events not one sixpence will go back to them. Is that not a contingent debt, though presently payable? That is exactly the condition of the debt here. Present payment is necessary, but there may be repayment, and that depends upon what may be the judgment of the House of Lords in the appeal.

I therefore entirely agree with the view of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. I agree with your Lordship that the only question is whether or not this is a contingent debt. If it is, then there can be no further question, because the 14th section of the Bankruptcy Act of 1856 says that sequestration cannot be awarded in respect of a contingent debt.

It appears to me that when the decree of the Court of Session ascertained the amount of the debt, and that it was due, it was not ascertained by a final judgment that the debt was due, for the effect of the presentation of the appeal to the House of Lords was that it was no longer ascertained by a final judgment that the debt was due. The matter remained in suspense, the question whether any debt is due at all depending upon whether the judgment of the Court of Session is affirmed or reversed. If the judgment is affirmed, the debt will be finally ascertained by decree to be due, and its amount will be fixed. If, however, the contingency of reversal happens, it is equally clear that no debt will ever be due. That being so, it appears to me beyond all question to be a contingent debt. Then according to my view it is only because it is a contingent debt, and for no other reason, that the necessity for an application to the Court of Session for interim execution pending appeal arises. If the debt is clearly due and ascertained there is no necessity for it. But the Legislature thought it right that a party who has obtained a decree in his favour in the Court of Session should have the use of the money decerned for in the meantime till it is finally ascertained whether the debt is due or not. The object therefore of the application for interim execution does not in the least alter the nature or contingency of the debt. If in this case the judgment of this Court is reversed, the money for payment of which decree was granted will be repaid and no debt will be due to the petitioner. If that is the nature of the debt, I think it is a contingent debt, and I see no difficulty in the fact that the petitioner has been allowed the interim use of the money, and none the less is it a contingent debt because diligence may have been done upon it. The debt having been ascertained to be a contingent debt, the Bankruptcy Act is a barrier over which the Court cannot pass to grant decree of sequestration.

Forbes v. Whyte.

LORD M'LAREN.—The question here is whether the petitioning creditor has a title to apply for sequestration, and that depends upon the 14th section of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, which while specifying the amount of the debt, &c., concludes with these words, "whether such debts are liquid or illiquid, provided they are not contingent."

We are familiar with the statute under which creditors who hold contingent claims are entitled to be ranked. But while it is allowed that in an existing sequestration the trustee should take cognisance of the contingent debt, it has not been thought proper that a contingent claim should be the foundation of sequestration, and I think the reason must be that the Judge applied to generally knows nothing of any debts excepting the petitioning creditor's debt, and the non-payment of a contingent debt does not constitute prima facie evidence of the debtor's inability to meet his obligations. If that be the reason of the statutory rule, I must say it applies strongly to a case of this description. In a certain sense no doubt this debt is due, because under statutory authority the Court has given decree for it notwithstanding an appeal to the House of Lords. But it is only interim execution, and there may be an order for repayment. I am of opinion that the interlocutor should be affirmed.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordship in the chair.

Succession—Heritable and Moveable—Conversion.—A testator conveyed his whole heritable and moveable estates (the former consisting of various house properties) to trustees, "to hold the rest and residue" for behoof of his children equally, share and share alike, and for payment of an annuity to his wife, "declaring always that my said trustees shall from time to time pay to my sons the interest or annual proceeds of the said shares," "and the principal of said shares provided to my said sons shall be payable to them respectively in five equal yearly instalments," the first "at the expiry of one year after the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas which shall occur after my death."

No. 39.

Dec. 4, 1890. Brown's Trustees v. Brown.

He further provided that, in fixing the amount of the annual proceeds to be paid to his sons his trustees should "always retain a sufficient sum" to meet and provide for the proportions of his wife's annuity; "and in fixing the principal sums to be paid to my said sons, my trustees shall always deduct the proportion" of the wife's annuity. The shares of daughters were to be held by the trustees for their behoof in liferent, and their children in fee. "And for the more effectually enabling my said trustees to pay my debts and manage and divide my estate as before mentioned, I authorise and empower them, if they judge proper, to sell and dispose of my whole subjects, heritable and moveable, above conveyed to them, at such times and in such manner, by public roup or private sale, as they may think proper." The testator further authorised the trustees to invest "the whole or any part of my estate, heritable and moveable," in certain securities, "declaring always that the trustees shall not be bound to alter, unless they see cause, the investment or securities of my estate as they may happen to be at my death, notwithstanding the same may not fall under any of the descriptions of securities above specified." The testator was predeceased by his wife, but was survived by six children. His moveable estate amounted to £225,000, and the heritage was valued at £35,000.

In the administration of the trust the trustees sold part of the heritage, and retained part at the request of the beneficiaries, and to await a rise in the property market.

Held that, in the circumstances, the exercise of the power of sale was indispensable to the execution of the trust, and that therefore the whole heritage must be treated as moveable succession.

2D DIVISION. M.

HUGH BROWN, merchant, Glasgow, died on 3d December 1870. He was predeceased by his wife, but was survived by his six children. He left heritable estate worth about £35,000, and moveable estate worth about £225,000.

By his trust-disposition and settlement, executed in 1865, before the death of his wife, Mr Brown conveyed his whole estate, heritable and moveable, to trustees. The purposes of the settlement were, inter alia, for payment of various legacies, and of an annuity to the testator's wife if she survived him. By the last purpose he directed that his trustees "shall hold" the whole residue of his estate, "heritable and moveable," for behoof of his whole lawful children, and the issue of such children as should die leaving lawful issue, subject to the following declarations and conditions, viz.:—"Declaring always that my said trustees shall, from time (sic), pay to my sons the interest or annual proceeds of the said shares provided to them as the same shall accrue, or at such periods, at least twice in each year, as my said trustees shall consider most suitable, and the principal of said shares provided to my said sons shall be payable to them respectively in five equal yearly instalments, commencing the first yearly instalment at the expiry of one year after the first term of Martinmas or Whitsunday which shall occur after my death; but in fixing the amount of annual proceeds so to be paid to my said sons, my said trustees shall always deduct the proportion of said annuity payable to my said wife; and, in fixing the principal sums to be paid to my said sons, my said trustees shall always retain a sufficient sum, of which they shall be sole judges, to meet and provide for the proportions of annuity provided to my said wife." The shares of daughters were to be held by the trustees for their behoof in liferent, and for their children in fee. "And declaring always that the above provision in favour of my children shall be in full of all claim of legitim," &c., "and if any of them claim their legal provisions, or repudiate or challenge the above-written provisions, conditions, and declarations, then he or she shall forfeit all right to my whole property before conveyed, the same going, in that case, to augment the fund for division among my other children: And for the more effectually enabling my said trustees to pay my debts and manage and divide my estate as before mentioned, I authorise and empower them, if they judge proper, to sell and dispose of my whole subjects, heritable and moveable, above conveyed to them, at such times and in such manner, by public roup or private sale, as they may think proper."

After the death of the testator the trustees entered upon the management of the trust-estate. In 1871 they sold subjects at Gourock, forming a small portion of the heritage, for £1100. In 1872 they sold the truster's house in Park Circus, Glasgow, for £6500. In 1874 they sold a property in West Regent Street, Glasgow, for £15,000, and in 1875 they sold a ground-annual in Pollokshaws for £4400. In all, their sales of heritage up to 1875 amounted to £27,000. The remainder, a property in Glasgow worth about £10,000, and a ground-annual of £62, 11s. 3½d., they decided, on the instructions of the beneficiaries, and in the hope of a rise in the property market, to retain in the meantime unsold.

In 1878 Robert Brown, one of the sons, died, leaving a widow and one child. The widow claimed terce and jus relictæ out of his estate.

In 1890 a question arose between Mrs Robert Brown, on the one hand, and her son and his curators on the other, as to the effect of Hugh Brown's settlement. Mrs Robert Brown maintained that that settlement operated conversion of the heritage, while her son and his curators maintained that it did not.

A case was stated to the Court putting the question, "Did the said trust-disposition and settlement operate conversion of the heritage?"

The trustees of Hugh Brown were first parties; Robert Brown, the son, with his curators, was the second party; Mrs Robert Brown was the third party.

Argued for the second party;—The settlement of Hugh Brown contained a mere power of sale. It was not disputed that a mere power would not operate conversion. Conversion was not indispensable to the working out of Hugh Brown's trust. That was shewn by the fact that his trustees held his properties and realised them in part only according to the state of the property market. The attitude of the beneficiaries had been held important in considering such questions, and had here operated reconversion.[1] The case of Sheppard[2] was in point.

Argued for the third party;—The question was one of intention. The deed shewed that the testator's intention was that the heritage should be converted. The course of holding part of it unsold had been taken as on the instructions of the beneficiaries, and in the hope of a rise in the property market. The deed directed the sons' "principal sums to be paid" in "five yearly instalments." The history of the trust was not unfavourable to the third party. The trustees seemed always to have recognised that there was conversion, but that the purposes of the deed, while they required conversion, would be satisfied if they were gradually carried out.[3]

No. 39. At advising,—

Dec. 4, 1890. Brown's Trustees v. Brown.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—There is no doubt that the decisions on this question of conversion are not quite satisfactory as guides in dealing with such a case as this. It appears that the majority of the seven Judges who decided the case of Sheppard, 12 R. 1193, decided in favour of the view that conversion had not taken place in deference rather to the decision of Lord Westbury and the other noble and learned Lords in Buchanan v. Angus (4 Macqueen, 374), than according to the views to which they would, but for that decision, have been inclined to give effect. At all events they would, but for that case, have had great difficulty in deciding the case of Sheppard as they did.

It appears to me that in such questions as the present, the first thing to be examined is the language of the deed itself. There is nothing in the decisions to indicate that if a testator by the expressions which he uses, and by the whole scope of his settlement makes it clear that he intended to convert the quality of his estate, there can be any doubt that his intention so expressed must have effect. And so far as I can find from the decisions quoted from the bar there has been no case in which a testator used the words "pay" or "payment" and "sums," and no other words, where the decision has been against conversion. Where the word "pay" has been held immaterial to the question, it has been always accompanied by other words such as "convey" more consistent with the quality of the estate remaining heritable. Probably the case which most nearly approaches the present upon this point is that of Baird, 8 R. 233, where the direction as to residue was to "pay and convey the same" equally among certain beneficiaries.

Now, looking at this deed, I think it is not possible, reading it as a whole (and I have so read it more than once with some care), to avoid coming to the conclusion that the testator intended conversion of his heritable estate. Without going over the various clauses in detail, I may say that I am particularly struck with the passage in which the testator directs that the principal of the shares provided to his sons shall "be payable to them respectively in five equal yearly instalments," and further directs that "in fixing the principal sums to be paid to my said sons, my said trustees shall always retain a sufficient sum, of which they shall be sole judges, to meet and provide for the proportions of annuity provided to my said wife." I think these passages, among others, are quite inconsistent with the view that the testator intended that his heritable estate should remain in a heritable form.

If I have rightly interpreted the intention of the testator, it follows that in order to carry it out conversion is necessary. I am therefore of opinion that the question in the case must be answered in the affirmative.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. There is no doubt as to what is the principle of the law of conversion. The question arises as to a man's will. It is whether the testator directed his money to be turned into land by buying land, or it may be his land to be turned into money by selling land. The estate is to be considered as of that character, land or money, to which he intended it to be converted. That is the whole law and principle of the matter.

Now, that question when raised on any will must be determined on the true construction of that will. If on that true construction the land is to be made money or the money land, there is no doubt as to what is the law. The direction may indeed be an implied direction, and if the terms of the will be such that a Court, addressing itself to the question of intention, is satisfied that the subject is intended to be converted, that will be held to be done. There is no different mode of collecting the intention of the testator between the case of conversion and any other case in which intention requires to be considered. We know nothing about that intention except from the will, and reading the will with the view of discovering what that intention is on this subject of conversion, we have to satisfy ourselves whether it was intended or not. Such being the intention, no authority can give us much aid, unless it be an authority which aids with some rule for the ascertainment of the intention. But for that purpose I am afraid no authority does give us any better help than we derive from reading the deed itself according to the ordinary meaning of its language.

Now, reading this will with a view to ascertain Mr Brown's intention, I am of opinion that he intended his heritable estate to be converted into money. The practical question is limited to a part of the heritage only, the whole being worth about £35,000, and constituting a comparatively small part of his means, for his moveable estate was about £225,000. Now, of that heritage, worth £35,000, the trustees, in the pursuance of his intention, have sold a part worth £27,000, and this question as to intention is limited to the remainder. It would be curious if he did intend to convert it to the amount of £27,000 and not to the whole amount. It is not a case of any other necessity than the due execution of the purposes of the will. But it is said, while no question is raised as to the intention leading to the conversion of the portion worth £27,000, that we cannot collect a similar intention as to the residue which the trustees retained till a better price could be got for it. I cannot assume that. I think the testator's intention was that that also should be sold when the trustees, in the exercise of their judgment, thought it best to sell it. His directions are such that it is difficult to imagine a man who could think they could be executed without a sale, though of course a man might if he liked direct a piece of heritable property to be conveyed in 100 pro indiviso shares. I cannot impute any other intention to this testator, who gave such directions as he did, than that there should be a sale. I collect from the purposes of his will that he intended to convert both the heritage worth £27,000, as to which no question is raised, and also the remainder.

Lord Rutherfurd Clark.—Having in view the decisions in the two cases of Sheppard and Duncan, I feel difficulty. But your Lordships are agreed that conversion took place, and I do not differ. I think that we may hold that the exercise of the power of sale was indispensable to the execution of the trust.

Lord Trayner.—I am of opinion, looking to the terms of the settlement of Mr Brown, that it was indispensable to the proper execution of the purposes of the trust thereby created that the power of sale which is contained in it should be exercised. The trustees could not have carried out, and cannot carry out, the trust purposes without selling heritage. I gather from that that it was the intention of the truster that his heritable property should be converted into money. I am therefore of opinion that the question should be answered in the affirmative.

The Court answered the question in the affirmative.

THE GOVERNORS OF THE LOGAN AND JOHNSTON SCHOOL OF DOMESTIC ECONOMY, Petitioners.—Napier.

School—Scheme by the Educational Endowment Commissioners—Alteration of scheme—Retiring allowance to teacher—Educational Endowments (Scotland) Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. c. 59), sec. 20.—Petition by governors of school for amendment of a scheme of the Endowment Commissioners by adding a clause giving power to the governors, with consent of the Scotch Education Department, to make compensation to teachers in schools discontinued by the scheme, granted.

The governors of an educational endowment, appointed under a scheme framed under the Educational Endowments Act, 1882, in terms of their scheme discontinued a school. The teachers had been in office for many years, and the governors were desirous of giving them some compensation. There was no power under the scheme to make such allowances, but the governors presented a petition to the Court to amend the scheme by conferring such a power. The Court amended the scheme by the addition of a clause empowering the governors, having regard to the circumstances of any particular case, and with consent of the Scotch Education Department, to make reasonable compensation to teachers or other officers in schools discontinued under the scheme.

2D DIVISION. M.

FOR many years prior to 1890 a school, in which girls, the children of poor parents, received an elementary education and were taught sewing, was carried on in Glasgow by certain trustees under the name of the Logan and Johnston School.

In 1890 the trustees were superseded by a body known as the Governors of the Logan and Johnston School of Domestic Economy, incorporated under a scheme prepared by the Commissioners acting under the Educational Endowments Act, 1882, and approved by an Order in Council.

By the scheme it was provided,—"The Governors shall, within twelve months after the date of this scheme, discontinue the school presently maintained by the Logan and Johnston Trustees, and may either sell or let the school buildings at a fair rent as to them may seem best, or they may utilise the said ground and buildings in such manner as may seem to them best for the purposes of this scheme; or, notwithstanding the provisions hereof, they may, on obtaining the authority of the Scotch Education Department, continue the school until such time as may be fixed"; and under subsequent sections of the said scheme provision was made for the petitioners maintaining a school of domestic economy in buildings to be erected or acquired by them.

Section 37 of the scheme (following upon the provisions of the 20th section of the Educational Endowments Act, 1882) provided,—"It shall be in the power of the Court of Session to alter the provisions of this scheme upon application made to them, with consent of the Scotch Education Department, by the governing body or any party interested, provided that such alteration shall not be contrary to anything contained in the Educational Endowments (Scotland) Act, 1882."

On 21st November 1890 the Governors presented a petition to the Second Division, stating that at 1st July 1890 they discontinued the school previously maintained by the trustees, and dispensed with the teachers. There were four teachers, three of whom had been employed in the school for twenty, nineteen, and twelve years respectively.

The petitioners stated that, in view of the length of service of these persons and of the usual practice of making some compensation to teachers whose services are so dispensed with, they considered that it would be reasonable and proper to make some compensation to those teachers, but that their scheme, unless amended, did not contain power to them to do so.

They obtained the consent of the Scotch Education Department to the presentation of the petition, but the Department "declined to commit themselves to any opinion on the subject of the proposed change." No. 40.

In these circumstances they prayed the Court to amend the scheme by the addition of the following words, viz.:—"And the Governors, having regard to the circumstances of any particular case, may, with consent of the Scotch Education Department, make such compensation as they think just and reasonable to teachers or other officers in schools which are discontinued under this scheme." Dec. 5, 1890. Governors of Logan and Johnston School.

The case of the Dollar Institution[1] was cited when the case was called in the Single Bills, but there was no argument.

THE COURT, without delivering opinions, pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lords . . . do amend the scheme prepared by the Commissioners appointed under the provisions of the Educational Endowments (Scotland) Act, 1882, constituting the Logan and Johnston School of Domestic Economy, approved of by Her Majesty the Queen by an Order in Council, dated 8th February 1890, by adding to the end of section 25 of the said scheme the following words:—'And the Governors, having regard to the circumstances of any particular case, may, with consent of the Scotch Education Department, make such compensation as they think just and reasonable to teachers or other officers in schools which are discontinued under the scheme,' and decern."

Process—Expenses—Caution for expenses—Pursuer in receipt of parochial relief.—In an action for declarator of property in a Sheriff Court the Sheriff ordained the pursuer, who was in receipt of parochial relief, and who did not apply for the benefit of the poor-roll, to find caution for expenses. Caution not having been found, the Sheriff assoilzied the defender. The pursuer appealed. No appearance was made for the defender, and from the pursuer's statements it seemed that she had acted for some time as proprietor of the subjects. The Court recalled the Sheriff's judgment, and remitted to him to proceed with the cause.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Dumfriesshire. I.

IN an action brought in the Small-Debt Court of Dumfriesshire by Mrs Anne Johnstone, residing at Lockerbie, against David Ogilvy for payment of the rent of a small house and garden at Hightae, Mrs Jane Richardson or Dryden, Lochmaben, appeared, and stated that she represented, under a power of attorney, Matthew Richardson, residing in America, who claimed to be proprietor of the subjects. In consequence of this appearance the Sheriff-substitute sisted the action to allow the question of right to be determined.

In April 1890 Mrs Johnstone raised an action in the Sheriff Court of Dumfriesshire against Mrs Dryden, as mandatary for Matthew Richardson, for declarator that she was proprietrix of the small house and garden.

The defender, besides her defences on the merits, averred,—"The pursuer is notour bankrupt, has for several years been relieved of rates and taxes on the ground of her poverty, and has been receiving parochial relief from the parish of Applegarth"; and pleaded;—(2) The pursuer being in the lower rank of life, being a pauper, and having taken no steps to be placed on the poor's-roll, which would have had the effect of eliciting a report whether there was a probabilis causa, should be ordered to find caution for expenses.

The pursuer admitted that she was in receipt of parochial relief to the amount of 1s. a-week, but quoad ultra denied the defender's statement.

On 23d May 1890 the Sheriff-substitute (Hope) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuer, being a pauper, is bound to find caution for expenses as a condition precedent to her being allowed to proceed with the case: Therefore sustains the second plea in law for the defender, and before further judgment appoints the pursuer to find caution for expenses within eight days."

On 9th September 1890, caution not having been found, the Sheriff-substitute (Campion) assoilzied the defender.

On appeal the Sheriff (Hope) varied the interlocutor of 23d May by substituting the words "in the circumstances" for the words "being a pauper," and quoad ultra affirmed that interlocutor and the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute of 9th September.

The pursuer appealed.

No appearance was made for the defender.

The pursuer argued;—A litigant was not obliged to find caution merely because of the fact that he was in receipt of parochial relief. That had been decided in the Second Division in Macdonald's case,[1] which was later than the case of Hunter[2] in which the First Division (according to the report) held that a person in receipt of parochial relief who refused to apply to the reporters on the probabilis causa in order to sue in forma pauperis, must find caution for expenses.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I think that the case of Macdonald, which seems to be the last decided case upon this question, is an authority for this proposition, that it does not follow as a matter of course from a pursuer being in receipt of parochial relief that he is not entitled to sue an action except on condition of either establishing a probabilis causa and so suing in forma pauperis, or finding caution for expenses. The case of Hunter v. Clark does indeed appear to be an authority to the effect that such a pursuer, if he cannot establish a probabilis causa, must find caution for expenses, but I see that the Judges who decided Macdonald v. Simpson considered that there must have been special circumstances in the case of Hunter v. Clark which led to the Court exercising its discretion in the manner in which it was there exercised.

Now, there are certain peculiar circumstances in the present case which are not favourable to a judgment ordaining the pursuer to find caution. To begin with, the defender does not choose to appear to defend the judgment she obtained and to state to us circumstances which would justify it. In these circumstances I think we are entitled to regard the statements of the pursuer as a substantially accurate account of the facts. Now, from these statements it seems that the pursuer had long enjoyed the right to certain heritable subjects. She let them and sued her tenant in the Small-Debt Court for the rent. The answer made to her was that she had no title, that someone else had a title. So far the case does not appear to be that of a person who has absolutely no estate. Now, the Sheriff sisted the small-debt action (I do not think discreetly) for the raising of a declarator of title, and the pursuer brought such a declarator, in order to establish a title, which had hitherto not been disputed. The defender maintained that in that action she must find caution because she had obtained prochial relief, and as she failed to do so he assoilzied the defender. I think that judgment was not justifiable in the circumstances.

I think that we should follow the case of Macdonald v. Simpson, and decide that the pursuer need not find caution as a condition of insisting in the action.

LORD YOUNG.—I think that the case of Macdonald rules this case. It is indistinguishable from it. I need not add more, as it would be merely to repeat my opinion in Macdonald's case.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I agree. At the same time I think it right to say that I doubt whether I am correctly reported in the case of Macdonald v. Simpson, in so far as I am represented as concurring in the judgment.

In the special circumstances of this case I am of opinion that we ought not to ordain the pursuer to find caution.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree, because there is no appearance by the defender. I do not proceed upon the general ground which has been stated by other members of the Court, that a person who is acknowledged to be a pauper in receipt of parochial relief, and has not chosen to apply for the benefit of the poor's-roll and to satisfy the reporters on probabilis causa that he ought to be allowed the benefit of the poor-roll, may be allowed to sue without finding caution. On that matter I adopt the opinion of the Lord President in Hunter v. Clark.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor appealed against, and remitted the cause to the Sheriff to proceed.

JAMES GOODWIN AND OTHERS, Complainers (Reclaimers).—Murray—Kennedy.

INDUSTRIAL AND GENERAL TRUST, LIMITED, AND MATTHEW DEAN GOODWIN, Respondents.—Asher—Ure.

Bill of Exchange—Charge—Suspension—Caution—Partnership.—One of six partners of a trading firm, which had sold its business to a limited company, granted a promissory-note, to which he signed the firm name as well as his own. The other partners having been charged to pay brought a bill of suspension. The respondents averred that the complainers had adopted the promissory-note. Held that, as the firm's signature could not bind the partners after the dissolution of the firm, and it lay upon the respondents to prove their averments of adoption, the bill should be passed without caution.

Bill-Chamber. 1ST DIVISION. Ld. Stormonth Darling. C.

THE firm of James Goodwin & Company, engineers and ironfounders, Motherwell and Ardrossan, consisted of six partners, one of whom was Mr Matthew Dean Goodwin. It had carried on business for twenty-five years prior to 1889.

In April 1889, the business of James Goodwin & Company, along with that of the Coats Iron and Steel Company, were sold to a limited company, under the name of Goodwin, Jardine, & Company, Limited.

On 17th and 18th October 1890, certain partners of the firm were charged, and others threatened to be charged, as partners and as individuals, at the instance of the Industrial and General Trust, Limited, to make payment to them of the sum of £7500, alleged to be due under a promissory-note bearing to be granted in favour of the chargers by James Goodwin & Company and Matthew Dean Goodwin, and dated 12th September 1889, payable six months after date.

No. 42.

Dec. 6, 1890. Goodwin v. Industrial and General Trust, Limited.

The partners, other than Matthew Dean Goodwin, brought a note of suspension of the charge, on the ground that the firm had ceased to exist, and the transaction and signature were unauthorised.

It was stated by the complainers that they had learned that it was arranged between three of the directors of the new company—one of whom was Mr Matthew Dean Goodwin—that, as £20,000 of the debenture capital of the new company had not been taken up, the £20,000 should be taken up in equal quantities by the two old firms, and that this should be effected by borrowing on the security of each £10,000 of debentures £7500 from the Industrial Trust, Limited. The promissory-note, which was the subject of the suspension, was granted for the loan. In these circumstances, it was averred that Mr Matthew Dean Goodwin's action was ultra vires; that he had no authority, express or implied, to bind the firm; and that the loan for which the promissory-note was granted was not a transaction within the line or scope of any business ever carried on by James Goodwin & Company; and further, that the charges unless suspended would operate notour bankruptcy, and so damage the credit of the new company, in which the complainers had a large interest.

The respondents averred, inter alia, that the complainers had adopted the transaction in question by giving authority, in a letter dated 16th July 1890, for the realisation of the £10,000 debentures held by the respondents in security.

The complainers, in answer, stated that said letter was granted by them only on the understanding that no proceedings should be taken against them.

The complainers pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The signature of "James Goodwin & Co." to the promissory-note charged on having been unauthorised by the complainers, and, separatim, the said loan not being within the line or scope of business carried on by James Goodwin & Company, the chargers are not entitled to enforce the same against the complainers, or any of them. (3) The firm of James Goodwin & Company having ceased to exist prior to the granting of the said note, the said signature did not bind any party other than Matthew Dean Goodwin, and the said note is not a legal ground or warrant for diligence against the complainers, or any party other than the said Matthew Dean Goodwin.

The respondents pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The promissory-note in question having been granted with the authority of the complainers, or having been subsequently ratified by them, suspension ought to be refused. (4) The complainers having by their actings condescended on, and particularly by the said letter of 16th July 1890, adopted the said promissory-note, are not now entitled to repudiate liability to pay the same.

The complainers submitted that the note ought to be passed without caution or consignation, but stated that, if necessary, they were willing to find caution.

The Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Stormonth Darling), on 31st October 1890, passed the note upon caution.

The complainers reclaimed, and argued that the note ought to be passed without caution.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The charge in this case upon the bill for £7500, was given against James Goodwin & Company, and also against Mr Matthew Dean Goodwin, the gentleman who signs the note, and the other partners of the firm, who now appear as complainers. The complainers are not in this case bound by their own signatures, and the question comes to be whether they are bound by the signature of Matthew Dean Goodwin. That is a question upon the merits, and it depends upon several considerations, but more particularly upon this, whether Mr Matthew Dean Goodwin had authority from the other partners of James Goodwin & Company to sign or accept bills. Now, I think one fact is perfectly clear, that he had no such authority, because this was a dissolved company at the time he signed the bill. Mr Asher has argued that it does not necessarily follow that the company of James Goodwin & Company is dissolved because its estate has been sold to another party. I confess I am not able to follow that contention. There may be contracts of a peculiar nature for the sale of the goodwill or the assets of a company which may not amount to a dissolution of the company. There may be such contracts, but where the sale is of the simple nature of which it here appears to be, and the whole business and interest of the company is transferred to a third party, the necessary result in law is that the original firm ceases to exist from the time that the sale is made. It certainly cannot carry on business in its own name, because it is already dissolved into fragments, nor can it carry on business for behoof of the vendee. Well then, for what purpose does it exist? Is it possible to say that it exists for any other purpose than that of winding up? And if that be so, nothing that any of the individual partners can do after the sale can bind his copartners, unless it be done in the course and for the purpose of winding up.

Now, the present obligation, constituted by the signature of Mr Matthew Dean Goodwin, is certainly not an obligation in the course of winding up, or for the purpose of winding up, but for another purpose altogether, viz., for the constituting of a new obligation and for the borrowing a sum of money, and investing it in a particular way. It follows, therefore, that that signature is not binding upon the other partners of the dissolved company.

It is said that the dissolution of the company was unknown to the respondents, but it does not appear to me that that is of very much importance in the present question. The important fact, to my mind, as to whether this note is to be passed on caution or otherwise, is that, in point of fact, the signature of Matthew Dean Goodwin is not, in law, binding upon the parties complainers. There is another way, no doubt, in which the signature of Matthew Dean Goodwin might be made binding, and that is if it could be shewn that the complainers adopted the instrument as their writ and obligation. But there is nothing alleged against them which would shew that they so adopted it. On the contrary, what we have before us leads to an opposite result, and goes to shew that, as soon as they were made aware of what had taken place, they acted on the understanding that it was not their writ, and consistently took up the position that they would not admit liability. This leads to the conclusion that unless the respondents can shew that the complainers have rendered themselves liable they will not be able to make the charge good against them individually. Upon that ground I should be prepared to hold that the note ought to be passed without caution.

It is fair also to consider the consequences upon the complainers of passing the note only upon caution. It has been represented by Mr Murray, and apparently with good reason, that if the complainers were compelled to find caution this would lead to a sequestration of their estates. This is a very serious consequence, because, but for this unfortunate complication of matters it does not appear that the complainers are insolvent or verging on insolvency, and it is therefore very hard to say that, because they are charged upon this obligation of Mr Matthew Goodwin, they are, in effect, to be made bankrupt and sequestrated because they are unable to find caution. I am therefore for recalling the interlocutor and remitting to the Lord Ordinary to pass the note without caution.

LORD ADAM.—We are at present sitting in the Bill-Chamber, and the question of caution or no caution is one which is entirely for the discretion of the Court. What is at the bottom of this case—and, I think, the most cardinal fact in it—is that the bill in question was signed by one of the partners after the dissolution of the firm. I think we had from the respondents what was equivalent to an admission in regard to this—although the admission is not made in terms. The business and goodwill of the old firm had been sold, and had passed into new hands; and I agree with your Lordship in thinking that, under these circumstances, the old firm must be held to have been dissolved before the bill was granted. Accordingly, we start with that fact, which is really made matter of admission. If the granting of the bill had been a matter which had taken place in the winding-up, and if the transaction had appeared upon the face of it to have been of that nature, the question might have been a different one; but it is clear that the present transaction has nothing to do with the winding up, and that the signature of the partner who signs the bill does not bind the other individual partners who are charged upon it.

Upon these admitted facts, I do not think the case is one for summary diligence. If the transaction can be shewn to have been adopted by the other partners, that would be a good answer to the complainers, but, in a suspension the moment such a plea becomes the disputed matter in the case, it at once follows that the note must be passed without caution. The onus of proving adoption falls upon the respondents; and the note is passed in order to give them an opportunity of establishing their plea. If they fail, then the charge is suspended.

That is, I think, enough for the disposal of the case. But I agree further with your Lordship that other matters may be taken into consideration. The chargers in the present case have a great deal of the property of the concern in their hands. This amounts to something like consignation. It may be true that this property is not at once realisable, but it is none the less to be regarded as valuable consideration in a question of caution. We are also entitled to look to what has been represented to us as the likely result of our finding the complainers bound to give caution. It has been represented that the effect would be most disastrous; and giving weight to this and the other considerations which have been urged, I think that, in the exercise of its discretion, the Court ought to pass this note without caution.

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree with your Lordships that it is perfectly clear that when James Goodwin & Company transferred their business and capital to the new company, from that moment the authority of any partner to bind his former partners by putting his name to a negotiable instrument came to an end. Therefore, in order that the company or its partners may be made responsible under the promissory obligation of one of their number, it must be shewn that in point of fact, authority was given. That might be by the subsequent adoption of the instrument, or it might be that the transfer of the business was not made public, in which case the members of the old partnership would be liable on the principle that they continued to hold themselves out as carrying on business under the company firm. No case of this description is raised upon this record, and the only question is whether the promissory-note has been adopted by the suspenders. The onus of establishing that proposition of course lies with the respondents. No. 42.

Dec. 6, 1890. Goodwin v. Industrial and General Trust, Limited.

So far as I am able to judge from the letters and documents before us, the suspenders were entirely ignorant of the existence of this promissory-note until their agent observed their names in the Register of Protests, in which the protest had been recorded with a view to immediate execution. I am therefore of opinion that the suspenders have shewn a prima facie case against the validity of the charge, and that they are entitled to have it suspended without caution.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and remitted to him to pass the note without caution.

Dec. 6, 1890. Lord Blantyre v. Clyde Navigation Trustees.

River—Navigation trustees—Powers and duties—Undertaking.—The undertaking of the Clyde Navigation Trustees was defined by the Clyde Navigation Consolidation Act, 1858, to embrace, inter alia, "The construction and completion of the several wet docks or tidal basins, quays, wharfs, ferry-slips, approaches, embankments or river dykes, and all other works and improvements shewn and described on the several plans and sections referred to in the recited Acts, and thereby authorised to be made and maintained."

Under one of the recited Acts, the Act of 1840, the Trustees of the Clyde Navigation (sec. 11) were "empowered to make and maintain" a variety of works, including the quays of Erskine Ferry on the Clyde, which were authorised to be reconstructed.

By section 50 of the Act of 1840 it was enacted that "the said quays shall, at expense of the said trustees, be repaired, so that the working of the said ferry and quay shall be made as convenient, and the working thereof as easy as before" the operations of the trustees.

In an action by the proprietor of the quays at Erskine Ferry for declarator that the trustees were bound to maintain the quays, the defenders contended that their obligation under sec. 50 of the Act of 1840 was fulfilled once for all as soon as they had repaired the quays, and that sec. 11 imposed no obligation on them, but merely conferred a power. Held that the construction and maintenance of the quays constituted together an accommodation work intended to compensate the owner for interference with his property, and that the pursuer was entitled to decree.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Kinnear. C.

IN January 1889 the south quay of the Erskine Ferry on the Clyde was damaged through having been struck by a steamer. Lord Blantyre, the proprietor of the quay and ferry, called on the Clyde Navigation Trustees to repair the quay, and on their repudiating liability, brought this action concluding for declarator "that the defenders are bound to maintain and keep in repair the quays or slips on the north and south sides of the River Clyde at the East Ferry of Erskine, commonly called 'Erskine Ferry,' and whole other works at, or connected with, said ferry, made, executed, and constructed under the powers and provisions contained in the Act 3d and 4th Victoria, chapter 118, entitled 'An Act for further deepening and improving the River Clyde and enlarging the harbour of Glasgow, and for constructing a wet dock in connection with the said river and harbour,' and 'The Clyde Navigation Consolidation Act, 1858,' 21st and 22d Victoria, chapter 149, now and from time to time as may be found necessary or expedient, and that at their own expense, and that the pursuer is not bound to maintain or keep the same in repair," and for decree ordaining the defenders to repair the said slips or quays.

The Erskine Ferry was one of ancient date, and the quay in question had been reconstructed and lengthened by the defenders since 1840, as part of the improvements in the navigation of the Clyde. The question mainly at issue was whether the maintenance and repair of the quay formed part of the undertaking of the defenders under their Acts. The material clauses of these Acts are given below.*

* The Clyde Navigation Consolidation Act, 1858 (21 and 22 Vict. cap. cxlix.), defined the undertaking of the Clyde Trustees thus (sec. 76):—"Subject to the provisions of this Act, and of any agreements authorised or confirmed by the recited Acts or this Act, and to the provisions and declarations of any conveyance granted to the Clyde Trustees, the undertaking of the trustees shall in terms of the recited Acts consist of," inter alia, "the construction and completion of the several wet docks or tidal basins, quays, wharfs, ferry-slips, approaches, embankments, or river dykes, and all other works and improvements shewn and described on the several plans and sections referred to in the recited Acts, and thereby authorised to be made and maintained, and the repair, maintenance, and improvement of the whole of the said works from time to time as may be found necessary or expedient; and subject to the provisions of this Act and the Acts herewith incorporated, the trustees are hereby authorised and empowered to carry on and complete the whole or such and so many of the said works as to them from time to time shall seem expedient, reserving always to the proprietors of lands adjacent to the river all rights to soil acquired from the river, and other rights competent to them at common law."

Among the recited Acts, the Act 3 and 4 Vict. cap. cxviii. sec. 11, enacted, —"That the trustees appointed by or under this Act shall be, and they are hereby empowered and authorised . . . to make, execute, construct, finish, maintain, and keep in repair the additional works upon, in, or along the river, and in connection with the said harbour, delineated or represented on the map or plan hereinafter mentioned [in sec. 12] and likewise the wet dock and other works and improvements hereby authorised to be made, and for these purposes to enter upon, take, occupy and use the several and respective lands, tenements, or other heritages upon, through, or adjoining to which the same are intended to be made, carried, executed, or constructed, within the boundaries or lines of works delineated on the said map or plan, or within the limits of the aftermentioned deviation, indemnification being always made to the owners, lessees, and occupiers of such lands, tenements, or other heritages in manner hereinafter provided; reserving always to the proprietors of lands adjacent to the said river all rights to soil or ground reserved to them by the said recited Acts, or this Act, or other rights competent to them at common law, except in so far as the same may be affected by the provisions of this Act. . . ."

Section 50 enacted,—"And be it enacted that nothing contained in this Act, or in any of the said recited Acts, shall affect, or be construed to affect in any degree the established ferries of," inter alia, Erskine West Ferry "on the said river, but the same shall be used and enjoyed in as ample and beneficial a manner as in times past, without being subject to the payment of any of the tolls, rates, or duties granted by any of the said recited Acts or this Act, and without being subject to any other jurisdiction than that to which they were subject previously to the passing of the said recited Acts and this Act; and also that a reasonable and sufficient space, unenclosed by walls, dykes, jetties, and other works shall be left on each side of the quays of the said ferries, for the free and convenient landing at all times of passengers, cattle, goods, and other things, . . . and the said several quays shall at the expense of the said trustees . . . be repaired, lengthened, altered, or reconstructed according to the advice and report of civil engineers of eminence, where such repair, lengthening, alteration, or reconstruction shall be rendered necessary by the

No. 43.

Dec. 6, 1890. Lord Blantyre v. Clyde Navigation Trustees.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The defenders being bound under their said Acts of Parliament to maintain and keep in repair the quays or slips of Erskine Ferry, and whole works thereat, so far as executed under the powers of their statutes, decree should be pronounced as concluded for, with expenses.

The defenders pleaded;—(2) In respect that Erskine Ferry piers form no part of the undertaking of the defenders under the said statutes, the defenders are not bound to maintain the same.

After a proof, the import of which sufficiently appears from the opinions of the Lord Ordinary and the Court, the Lord Ordinary (Kinnear) granted decree as concluded for.*

works carried on by the said trustees for deepening the river, under and by virtue of the said recited Acts or this Act, and so as the said ferries and quays shall be made as convenient, and the working thereof as easy as before or as nearly so as may be."

Section 51,—"And be it enacted that at the East Ferry of Erskine it shall not be lawful for the said trustees to erect any embankment or dyke within 150 yards on either side of either of the ferry piers or quays, and that whenever the said trustees shall cut off any part of the north pier or quay of the said ferry they shall alter and reconstruct such north pier or quay so as to make it most convenient for and in a line with the pier and quay on the south side, and whenever the said trustees shall cut off any part of the projecting point of the shore above the said north pier or quay by which an eddy upwards is formed by the ebbing tide greatly facilitating the passage of the ferry boats, the said trustees shall so cut in upon the shore between the said point and the new north pier or quay as to form a bay similar to that which now exists, and thereby preserve as far as may be practicable the same eddy tide above the north pier or quay; and at the West Ferry of Erskine it shall not be lawful for said trustees to extend the embankments or dyke so as to interfere with the free and convenient passage of the said ferry."

* "OPINION.—The question raised by this action is, whether the defenders are bound to repair and maintain, as part of their undertaking, the quays and other works constructed by them, under the authority of Acts of Parliament, for the Erskine Ferry, of which the pursuer is proprietor. The maintenance of these works against ordinary wear and tear would appear to require a very trifling expenditure. But from their position in the river they are exposed to injury in consequence of vessels coming violently against them, and breaking or tearing away the stonework of the quays. They have, in fact, been materially damaged from this cause; and the pursuer maintains that the burden of repairing the damage must fall upon the defenders as part of the burden of general maintenance. The defenders, on the other hand, allege that the ferry quays are no part of their undertaking, that no obligation of maintenance is imposed upon them by their statutes, and that if the quays have been damaged by no fault of theirs, the loss must fall upon the pursuer, to whom they belong, according to the maxim res perit domino.

"The ferry, which is an ancient one, was provided with sufficient quays before the Clyde Navigation Acts came into force. But the pursuer's claim arises in consequence of alterations and reconstruction, which were rendered necessary by the operations of the Trustees under these Acts. His existing rights as against the Trustees depend upon the Act of 1858, which is the only Act now in force. But the quays in question were partly constructed under the previous Act of 1840, and it may be necessary to consider whether they formed part of the undertaking authorised by that Act.

"By the 11th section of the Act of 1840 the Trustees are empowered, inter alia, 'to execute, maintain, and keep in repair the additional works upon, in, or along the river delineated or represented on a plan' deposited in the Sheriff-clerk's office. The first point in controversy is, whether any alteration or reconstruction of the Erskine Ferry quays is included among the additional works so authorised, the pursuer maintaining that such alterations are delineated on the

Dec. 6, 1890.
Lord Blantyre v. Clyde Navigation Trustees.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The reconstruction of the quay in question did not form one of the additional works authorised by the deposited plan as works to be executed, and the defenders that the quays are shewn only as existing features of the river at the passing of the Act, and not as authorised improvements. The plan cannot be read without reference to the relative sections; but reading the plan and sections together, and with the aid of the evidence of the experts who have been examined, I cannot think it doubtful that a reconstruction of the piers of Erskine Ferry on both sides of the river is represented as among the works which the promoters proposed to execute. The exact character of the proposed alterations is more clearly stated in the statutory notices served upon the pursuer. But the indications of the plan and sections are entirely in accordance with the description of the notice. They appear to me to shew that the promoters of the Act desired to obtain power from Parliament to reconstruct the ferry quays, irrespective of any claim for reconstruction which might arise to Lord Blantyre in consequence of their other operations. I think the powers so desired were conferred by the 11th section of the Act, and that the Trustees, in the exercise of these powers, might have reconstructed the quays as part of their improvement scheme without the consent or against the opposition of the pursuer.

"But, assuming this to be so, the defenders maintain that the works executed under the Act of 1840 were not in fact executed by virtue of any power conferred by the 11th section, but at the instance of the pursuer himself, under the provisions in his favour, contained in the 50th section of the statute. If the reconstruction of the quays, as actually carried out, was in accordance with the design which the trustees took power to execute, it does not appear very material that they were not only authorised, but were also compellable to effect a reconstruction. But when the pursuer made his demand under the 50th section he could not have insisted, and did not in fact insist, upon the execution of such works as were actually constructed. The ferry had been rendered unworkable by an alteration of the water level consequent upon the trustees' operations, and all that he demanded, and all that he was entitled, as of right, to require of the trustees was the execution of comparatively insignificant works for the purpose of adapting the quays to the altered level of the water. But it was suggested that if the quays were to be altered at all, it might be more expedient to carry out the works authorised by the 11th section than to make a temporary alteration to satisfy the pursuer's demand, and another and larger alteration when the river should come to be widened at that point. The result was that the works as actually constructed went beyond what the pursuer could have demanded as of right, and were carried out in accordance with the parliamentary plan and sections of 1840, except that there was an insignificant difference in the surface gradient, and that the piers on each side of the river, as at first constructed, were 75 feet within the parliamentary line. The result of the pursuer's action of 1864 was to add 75 feet to each of the piers; and as now completed they are thus in conformity with the design authorised by the Act of 1840.

"The opinion which I have formed is, that the quays so constructed are part of the undertaking of the Trustees, and must be maintained as such. Everything they were authorised to do by the Act of 1840 was a purpose of the Act and a part of the undertaking. The analogous provisions of the Railways Clauses Act have been so construed (see Wilkinson v. Hull Railway Company, L. R., 20 C. D. 329; Lord Beauchamp v. Great Western Railway Company, L. R., 3 Ch. 745); and although the language of the statutes is not identical, the principle of construction adopted in these cases appears to be applicable. It is said that the quays were reconstructed for the accommodation of the pursuer alone. This is not exactly accurate, because the public using the ferry is equally interested with the proprietor in its efficiency, and also because the Trustees' plans for the widening of the river involved an alteration in the foreshore, and a consequent reconstruction of the north pier, irrespective of the necessities of the ferry. But if no one were interested but the pursuer, the maintenance of accommodation works may be just as much a purpose of the Act and a part of the undertaking

Act of 1840. Even if it did, its maintenance and repair did not form part of the undertaking of the trustees. The 50th section of the Act of 1840, which imposed an obligation on the trustees, was fulfilled once the quays were reconstructed. The 11th section, which dealt with maintenance, empowered the trustees merely, did not oblige them. Repair and maintenance of the quay was no part of the undertaking.[1]

The pursuer's argument sufficiently appears from the opinion of the Lord Ordinary and the Court.

At advising, the opinion of the Court (LORD PRESIDENT, LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR) was delivered by LORD M'LAREN.—The summons concludes that the defenders, the Clyde Trustees, are bound to maintain and keep in repair the north and south quays of Erskine Ferry, and that the defenders should be ordained forthwith to repair these quays to the satisfaction of a person of skill to be named by the Court. The Lord Ordinary has granted the decree concluded for, and we are of opinion that Lord Blantyre is entitled to this decree.

The chief question for consideration is whether in the present condition of the channel of the Clyde these quays or piers are to be considered a part of the undertaking of the Clyde Trust, in which Lord Blantyre has such an interest that he may require the Clyde Trustees to keep the piers in repair.

This question of course depends on the terms of the Acts of Parliament which define and regulate the undertaking of the Clyde Trust. The Act from which the existing body of trustees immediately derives its authority is the Act of 1858; but the undertaking of the defenders as there defined (section 76) embraces,—"The construction and completion of the several wet docks or tidal basins, quays, wharfs, ferry-slips, approaches, embankments or river dykes, and all other works and improvements shewn and described on the several plans and sections referred to in the recited Acts, and thereby authorised to be made and maintained." The plain import of this description is to define the undertaking by a reference to the plans and sections and authorising enactments of the Act of 1840.

The only clauses of the Act of Parliament of 1840 which it is necessary to consider are the 11th and the 50th and 51st. The 11th section empowers the Clyde Trustees to make and maintain the works which are "delineated or represented" on the map or plan thereafter referred to, and the 12th section amplifies this reference by setting forth the plan and sections and book of reference which together constitute the description of the new works intended to be executed under parliamentary authority. The plan and sections were exhibited at the argument, and we agree with the Lord Ordinary in holding that the piers of Erskine Ferry are those shewn as part of the proposed undertaking, and that the meaning of the markings on the plan is that these piers were to be rebuilt substantially in the form and manner in which they have been actually constructed.

as the maintenance of works that are indispensable for the navigation of the river. The question depends upon the construction of the statutes; and it appears to me to be established that the quays in question are among the works 'shewn and described on' the parliamentary plans and sections of 1840, and part of the undertaking defined by the 76th section of the Act of 1858."

The only clauses of the Act of Parliament of 1840 which it is necessary to consider are the 11th and the 50th and 51st. The 11th section empowers the Clyde Trustees to make and maintain the works which are "delineated or represented" on the map or plan thereafter referred to, and the 12th section amplifies this reference by setting forth the plan and sections and book of reference which together constitute the description of the new works intended to be executed under parliamentary authority. The plan and sections were exhibited in the argument, and we agree with the Lord Ordinary in holding that the piers of Erskine Ferry are those shewn as part of the proposed undertaking, and that the meaning of the markings on the plan is that these piers were to be rebuilt substantially in the form and manner in which they have been actually constructed.

[1] the maintenance of works that are indispensable for the navigation of the river. The question depends upon the construction of the statutes; and it appears to me to be established that the quays in question are among the works shewn and described on' the parliamentary plans and sections of 1840, and part of the undertaking defined by the 76th section of the Act of 1858."

Lord Blantyre v. Clyde Navigation Trustees.

The 50th section of the Act of 1840 may be described as a provision inserted in the Act of Parliament for the protection of the owners of certain piers and ferries, including Erskine Ferry. As to these it is provided that the said several quays shall, at the expense of the trustees, but with the approbation and consent of the proprietors, be repaired, lengthened, altered, or reconstructed according to the advice and report of civil engineers of eminence where such repair, lengthening, alteration or reconstruction shall be rendered necessary by the works carried on by the said trustees for deepening the river.

The defenders found on this, the 50th section, as being, in their view, a direction to them to execute once for all certain works in the nature of alterations or improvements of the ferry piers for the benefit of Lord Blantyre. Having rebuilt the piers, they say that the obligation to Lord Blantyre is fulfilled, and that their powers and duties under the 50th section are at an end.

We, however, are satisfied that the obligations of the Clyde Trustees in this matter are not constituted by the 11th section only, or by the 50th section only, but by the two sections taken together.

The main work in this part of the Clyde is the embanking and deepening of the river channel, and this work could not be executed in its entirety without interference with the ferries. It was therefore a necessary part of the scheme of the trustees that the north and south piers of Erskine Ferry should be reconstructed, and the plan and sections shew that this was to be done. But the trustees were not limited to a definite period of time for the execution of their works, and as it might happen that the ferries should be injuriously affected by operations completed before the reconstruction of the piers, and as in any case it was not intended that the trustees should have the power to indefinitely postpone the ferry improvement, the 50th section was passed giving the ferry owner a qualified right to compel the execution of the necessary improvements. Reading the 50th section as supplementary and auxiliary to the 11th section, which we conceive to be the true principle of interpretation, the reconstruction of the piers of Erskine Ferry is a part of the undertaking of the Clyde Trust, and according to the tenor of the 11th section they are to be made and maintained by the Clyde Trustees. It is not to be supposed that the trustees are bound to maintain in perpetuity every piece of work which they may construct in accordance with their powers. Where no private interest is concerned the work may be allowed to go to ruin, or may be taken down and replaced by work of a better design. But where the work executed is in the nature of a substituted pier intended to give the owner of a ferry the same kind of accommodation which he had before, but in a form more convenient for the navigation of the river, the trustees cannot, in our opinion, separate the obligation to maintain from the obligation to execute. The construction and maintenance of the piers constitute together an accommodation work intended to compensate the owner for the interference with his property; and this is no more than the owner is reasonably entitled to; because (first) the liability to injury through collisions is very different in the case of a great navigable channel open to vessels of the largest tonnage from what it was before the deepening of the channel was begun, and (secondly) the cost of repairing the present piers is very much greater than any sum which could have been expended on the piers of the ancient ferry.

In the view which we take it is not necessary to trace the successive alterations which have been made on the Erskine Ferry piers from time to time. All the alterations were made by the trustees in the exercise of their statutory powers, and the work is neither more nor less the undertaking of the trustees because it has undergone more than one transformation. In the absence of any suggestion that Lord Blantyre is in any way responsible for the damage to the pier, we think that so far as he is concerned the damage must be treated as a partial destruction of the subject which the Clyde Trustees have to make good. If any claim exists against the ship which came into collision with the pier, that will be a claim on the part of the Clyde Trustees for damage to work which is under their care, and which they are bound to maintain.

For these reasons, which are substantially those assigned in the Lord Ordinary's judgment, we are of opinion that we ought to adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against.

THE COURT adhered.

Mines and minerals—Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. cap. 58), sec. 13—Check-weigher—Interdict.—By the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, the miners employed in a pit may at their own cost appoint "a check-weigher" to take a correct account on their behalf of the weight of mineral raised, and to determine the deductions to be made therefrom. The check-weigher may on certain grounds be removed by a Court of summary jurisdiction in a proceeding at the mine-owner's instance.

In a proceeding by the owner of a mine for removal of J. A., a check-weigher, the Court of summary jurisdiction refused to remove him. The owner then dismissed the men employed, but re-engaged them on condition that J. A. should not be re-appointed. The miners did not re-appoint J. A. The owner then brought a process of interdict to have J. A. interdicted from entering his premises. Held that J. A.'s appointment having fallen, interdict must be granted.

THE MERRYTON COAL COMPANY, of which Andrew Douglas Brand and Wallace Thorneycroft were the sole partners, carried on a colliery at Larkhall. The miners were employed under an agreement by which their contract of service was terminable without notice by either party. In October 1889 the miners at No. 1 Merryton Pit appointed John Anderson as their check-weigher.*

On 5th August 1890 the Merryton Coal Company presented an application in the Sheriff Court at Hamilton to have Anderson removed from

* The Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. c. 58), enacts (sec. 13, subsec. 1),—"The persons who are employed in a mine, and are paid according to the weight of the mineral gotten by them, may at their own cost station a person (in this Act referred to as 'a check-weigher') at each place appointed for the weighing of the mineral, and at each place appointed for determining the deductions, in order that he may, on behalf of the persons by whom he is so stationed, take a correct account of the weight of the mineral or determine correctly the deductions, as the case may be."

By subsec. (2) a check-weigher is to have every facility afforded to him for enabling him to fulfil his duties. By subsec. (3) a check-weigher shall not be authorised in any way to impede or interrupt the working of the mine. By subsecs. (4) and (5) a mine-owner or agent or manager who desires the removal of a check-weigher, on the ground that he has interrupted the working of the mine, or for any similar reason, may apply to a Court of summary jurisdiction, who, his position as checkweigher. After hearing evidence the Sheriff refused the application.

Thereafter, upon 18th August 1890, the Merryton Coal Company posted up at the pit-head the following notice:—"Merryton Colliery, 18th August 1890.—Every collier working here is hereby formally dismissed from our employment. All may consider themselves re-engaged on the conditions that they do not appoint John Anderson as their checkweigher. All other conditions of employment to remain the same. Those men who go down to-morrow, or on any future day, do so on the distinct understanding that they agree to the above conditions of employment. John Anderson will not be allowed on the ground again. The graith of those who decline to work under these conditions will be sent to the surface."

A number of the miners resumed work after the posting of these notices, and Anderson was not allowed to return to the premises, though he presented himself for the purpose upon 19th August and on 2d October.

On 22d August in consequence of Anderson insisting upon his claim to act as "check-weigher," the Merryton Coal Company, and individual partners, presented a note of suspension and interdict, craving the Court to interdict Anderson from entering or trespassing upon any part of the lands and premises occupied by them.

No check-weigher was again appointed by the miners till after the presentation of the note, but after its presentation they on 27th October appointed another man to be check-weigher.

The note was passed and a record made up.

The respondent stated with regard to the notice;—"The complainers had no power to summarily dismiss the said miners for electing the respondent to be their check-weigher. The respondent has never entered upon the premises of the complainers except when he had a legal right to be there."

On 18th November 1890, the Lord Ordinary (Trayner) granted interdict as prayed for.*

if satisfied that there is sufficient prima facie cause for removal of the checkweigher, may call upon him to shew cause against his removal, and thereafter at the hearing of the cause, if sufficient ground be shewn, shall make a summary order for his removal.

* "OPINION.—The respondent was check-weigher at one of the complainers' pits; and was appointed to that office by the miners there employed, under the powers conferred on them by the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, section 13.

"The complainers were dissatisfied with the respondent's conduct, and applied to the Sheriff to have him removed, but the Sheriff dismissed their application. The complainers thereafter dismissed their miners, who had appointed the respondent, and only re-engaged them on the stipulation that they would not appoint the respondent as their check-weigher. The miners, on their re-employment, did not re-appoint the respondent, and have (since the present proceedings were instituted) appointed another check-weigher. In these circumstances it is plain enough that the respondent has now no right to enter upon the complainers' premises as check-weigher, and he pretends to no other title authorising his presence there. I have been asked, however, by both parties to decide this case, taking the circumstances as they stood at the date of presenting the note of suspension,—that is, disregarding the subsequent appointment of a new check-weigher. Taking the case in that view I am of opinion that the complainers are entitled to the interdict which they seek.

"The respondent was appointed by the miners who were at the time employed at the mine; it is only the persons 'who are employed in the mine' who have Merryton Coal Co. v. Anderson.

The respondent reclaimed, and argued;—The respondent was entitled to be at the colliery. At the time the note for interdict was presented he was the only check-weigher whom the men had appointed. The basis of the interdict was a pretended dismissal and re-engagement of the men on a condition applying to him. But that was just a trick to deprive him of his position, after the Sheriff had refused to remove him in the statutory manner. If the plan succeeded it would give a coalmaster a veto upon the election by the men. The case of Whitehead v. Holdsworth[1] was not in point, because it was decided under an Act under which the check-weigher must himself be one of the men in the employment of the coal-master. But under the Act of 1887 this was not so. The men appointed and paid a check-weigher, with whom the owner had no relation.

The complainers were not called on.

THE COURT (LORD JUSTICE-CLERK absent), without delivering opinions, adhered to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

1st DIVISION. Lord Kincairney. C.

MESSRS MORGAN, GELLIBRAND, & COMPANY, merchants in London, indorsees of bills of lading of a cargo of flax shipped at Riga for Dundee, brought an action of damages against Messrs Martin & Company and the Dundee Gem Line Steam Shipping Company for loss incurred through delay, &c., in the delivery of the cargo. It was averred against Messrs Martin & Company that they were creditors of the Riga merchants who had shipped the cargo, and that they had devised a scheme by which, upon the misrepresentations, they had induced these merchants to send the cargo to Dundee, with the view of securing and realising it, and thereby obtaining payment of their debt, and further, that they had, by arresting the cargo on its arrival to found jurisdiction, and afterwards, on the dependence of an action against the merchants, succeeded in obstructing the delivery to the pursuers.

It was not alleged that the Dundee Gem Line Steam Shipping Company were in any way connected with the fraud.

statute the power of appointing a check-weigher. It appears to me that such appointment must fall when the persons who make it cease to be employed at that mine; because (1) if on their ceasing to be employed no other miners are employed in their place, the work at the mine ceases, and there is no need of a check-weigher; and (2) if other miners are engaged in place of those who had ceased to be employed, then they, in turn, have right to appoint their own check-weigher. The case of Whitehead (Nov. 8, 1878, L. R., 4 Ex. Div. 13) is not distinguishable from the present case, and I concur in the judgment there pronounced. The statute under consideration in that case was not the statute now in force. But so far as regards the present question the Act of 1887 is only a re-enactment of the provisions of the Act of 1872."

Dec. 9, 1890. Morgan, Gellibrand, & Co. v. Dundee Gem Line Steam Shipping Co., Limited.

The Lord Ordinary (Kincairney), on 15th July 1890, allowed the pursuers a proof of their averments as against Messrs Martin & Company, but assoilzied the Gem Line Steam Shipping Company.

The pursuers reclaimed.

At the hearing, they asked to be allowed to amend their record by adding to their averments against the Gem Line Steam Shipping Company, which the Lord Ordinary had not thought sufficiently specific. In their amended case, the pursuers alleged that the Gem Company were parties to the fraud as well as the other defenders.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I do not think there can be any doubt that the condition of allowing this amendment must be that the reclaimers shall pay the expenses since the date of closing the record. This is one of a considerable class of cases in which we are called upon to allow such amendments, in the case of records which have been closed without proper consideration. It appears to me that sufficient attention is not paid to the state of the record even in this Court. We have had occasion very lately to see what scant attention is paid in the inferior Courts at that stage of the process, and I think that if we are to apply the rule to which we have given effect in the cases to which I have alluded (Campbell v. Prestongrange Coal Co., Dec. 2, 1890, and Macdonald v. Clyde Shipping Co., Dec. 6, 1890, both in the First Division) from the inferior Courts, multo magis are we bound to apply it to records made up in this Court.

There is another consideration in the present case which leads to the same result. The action has now been converted into an action based upon the ground of fraud, which it was not before the amendment was made. This amounts of course to a very serious charge, and I do not think that amendments of so serious a character ought to be allowed, except upon the condition of payment of expenses from the date of the closing of the record.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am glad that your Lordship has called attention to the necessity for greater care on the part of counsel and agents at that stage of a process which consists in the closing of the record. I am aware that very little time is allowed by the statute for consideration of the pleadings prior to the record being closed, but an application may always be made to the Lord Ordinary, and a reasonable postponement will always be granted. I rather think there may be too great a desire to minimise expense in the earlier stages of a process, and that this may perhaps account for what takes place.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT, on condition of the pursuers paying the defenders' expenses from the date of closing the record, allowed the amendments to be made, and appointed the amended record to be printed and boxed; further, allowed an account of the expenses as taxed to be given in, and remitted to the Auditor to tax and report.

a person who had contracted with a coalmaster for the sinking of a pit was killed by the fall of a "kettle" used in raising material. The kettle and all the appliances connected with it were supplied by the coalmaster under a written contract, which provided, "the contractor to pay his own pitheadmen, and take upon himself the responsibility of their conduct when at work, and any accident that may befall them in the execution of his orders. He must therefore satisfy himself as to the condition and strength of all materials and tackling provided for him, it being understood that he may stop work till the necessary alterations or repairs are made."

In an action at the instance of the representatives of the miner against the coalmaster it was proved that the plant supplied by the defender were reasonably safe and sufficient, though somewhat old-fashioned, and not provided with recent improvements, which would have rendered the accident impossible; further, that the accident occurred through the neglect of the contractor's pitheadman.

Held that the defender was not responsible.

Opinions (per Lord Young and Lord Trayner) that a person who supplies plant to a contractor with which the contractor is satisfied, and which he accepts, is not responsible to one of the contractor's servants for defects in that plant.

At the mouth of a pit which was being sunk to a greater depth there was no fencing, except that there was a moveable wooden block upon the rails leading to the pit mouth, which it was the duty of the pitheadman not to remove unless he was satisfied that the covering table was on the pit mouth. Held that this arrangement was not in breach of the statutory rules.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Fifeshire.
M.

JANE BUCHANAN OR M'GILL AND OTHERS, the widow and children of James M'Gill, a miner, raised an action in the Sheriff Court of Fifeshire against Bowman & Company, coalmasters, Buckhaven, to recover damages for his death, which occurred through an accident at the defenders' pit on 8th April 1889. The pursuers alleged that the accident occurred through the defenders' fault.

The accident occurred in the following circumstances, as disclosed by a proof. In and prior to April 1889 the defenders' No. 1 pit at Muiredge Colliery was being sunk to a greater depth. They entered into a written contract in June 1888 with George Swan, whereby he undertook to deepen the existing No. 1 pit in accordance with a certain specification, and to the satisfaction of their manager. This contract provided, inter alia, that the defenders should furnish the necessary materials (with certain exceptions). It also provided as to the men who were to execute the work, as follows:—"Men.—The contractor to pay his own pitheadmen, and take upon himself the responsibility of their conduct when at work, and any accident that may befall them in the execution of his orders. He must therefore satisfy himself as to the condition and strength of all materials and tackling provided for him, it being understood that he may stop work till the necessary alterations or repairs are made."

The defenders provided the materials, and Swan proceeded with the work. One of the men whom he employed was the deceased man M'Gill. The nature of the mechanism which the defenders supplied for bringing up the substance taken out in the course of the work was as follows, as described by the Sheriff-substitute:—"A 'kettle' was suspended by a rope over a pulley above the shaft; a line of rails was laid up to the shaft mouth, on which a bogie travelled; about a yard and a-half from the edge of the shaft there was a moveable wooden block which, when laid across the rails, prevented the bogie travelling to the shaft mouth; the shaft mouth was furnished with a covering table on wheels, which could be run off and on, and which moved in a different direction from the rails on which the bogie travelled. In working with these appliances, when it was desired to lower the kettle, it was the pitheadman's duty, after seeing that the covering-table was on the mouth of the shaft, to open the block, run the bogie, with the empty kettle on it, on to the covering-table, attach it to the clevis and rope, signal to the engineman to raise the kettle off the bogie; that being done, to run off the bogie, close the block, remove the covering-table from the shaft mouth, and the kettle was then lowered into the shaft and filled."

Early on the morning of 8th April a man named Gray, who was in Swan's employment, was pitheadman at No. 1 pit. While the bogie carrying the kettle was on the rails near the pithead, and the rope was being brought up the shaft Gray was standing at the covering-table ready to push it over the shaft mouth. The wind blew his lamp out, and he went away to light it. When he returned he forgot that the covering-table was not on the shaft mouth, and opened the block, and moved forward the bogie and kettle on to the mouth of the shaft. There being no covering-table to receive them, they fell into the pit, and killed M'Gill, who was working below.

The pursuers averred that this accident occurred "through the pithead appliances being insufficient. They were of primitive character, and, had they been such as are in ordinary use, the accident could not have happened." They further stated that the defenders had failed to provide the fencing at the top of the shaft which was provided for in rule 19 of the general rules contained in the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1887,* and that, if the shaft had been fenced, no accident could have taken place.

The defenders denied these averments, and pleaded that the deceased not having been in their employment at the time of the accident, they should be assoilzied.

It appeared from the evidence that the apparatus above described had been in use for many years in the district, and it was regarded by the defenders' witnesses as reasonably safe and sufficient; but, on the other hand, it appeared from the evidence of other witnesses that there were newer and safer methods of working, though these were, in the opinion of a mining engineer of great experience (Dr Landale), who was examined for the defenders, objectionable in certain respects.

* The Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. cap. 58), provided (sec. 49),—"The following general rules shall be observed, so far as is reasonably practicable, in every mine:— . . . Rule 19. The top and all entrances between the top and bottom, including the sump, if any, of every working, ventilating, or pumping shaft shall be properly fenced, but this shall not be taken to forbid the temporary removal of the fence for the purposes of repair or other operations if proper precautions are taken."

Section 115 of the Special Rules for the Mines established under section 51 of the Act, under the heading "Supplemental Special Rules for pits or mines in course of sinking or resinking," provided that the "pitheadman shall see that no rails are laid up to the mouth of the shaft without some provision being made to prevent the waggons being pushed into the shaft."

No. 46.

Dec. 9, 1890.
M'Gill v. Bowman & Co.

It appeared that Swan, the contractor, the employer of the deceased, had accepted without any objection the appliances in question as in fulfilment of the defenders' obligation to him under the contract.

The Sheriff-substitute (Gillespie), after findings in fact to the effect above given, found "that the pithead appliances provided by the defenders were objectionable in respect that the rails were laid up to the mouth of the shaft, while the covering table moved in a different direction from the rails, and there was no sufficient protection to prevent the bogie being pushed into the shaft when the covering table was off it; that this construction of pithead appliances has been generally superseded by other constructions which prevent the bogie being pushed down the shaft by the carelessness of the pitheadman, and are recognised by practical men as safer, as for instance, making the covering table travel in the same directions as the rails, so that the bogie cannot be pushed on to the shaft mouth except when the covering table is there, or the same result is attained by laying the rails on to the covering table at its position when it is not on the shaft; or the covering table can be put on hinges, so that when raised off the shaft mouth it fences the hutchway; or if the covering table does move in a different direction from the rails, it can carry a fence so placed as to fence the hutchway when the covering table is not on the shaft, and leave the hutchway open when the covering table is on the shaft; that no sufficient reason has been shewn for the adoption by the defenders of a method deficient in safety: Finds in law that a duty being incumbent on the defenders to provide pithead appliances, and they having provided appliances of an unnecessarily dangerous construction, which allowed the accident to happen, they are liable to the pursuers in damages and solatium for M'Gill's death: Assesses the same at £130, for which decerns against the defenders: Finds the defenders liable in expenses."

On appeal, the Sheriff (Mackay) adhered.

The defenders appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—The system and the materials supplied to Swan were reasonably safe and sufficient. This particular accident might not have occurred with the newest appliances, but those appliances had their own dangers and inconveniences. A person who used materials, which were thought sufficient and proper when they were erected, was not bound, even in a question with his own servants, to change his system and appliances whenever any improvement was introduced.[1] But the deceased was not the defenders' servant but Swan's, and Swan had accepted without demur the defenders' appliances, and must be taken to have been quite satisfied. There was no evidence of any breach of the contract between the defenders and Swan, and that alone would lead to absolvitor.[2] The cause of accident was the blunder of Gray, the pitheadman, and in no view was there liability for him. On a sound construction of the general and special rules under the Act of 1887, these rules had been observed.

The pursuer argued;—The evidence shewed that the system provided by the defenders was not reasonably safe. Swan was only bound to be satisfied with the "condition and strength" of the materials furnished to him. But that did not relieve the defenders from responsibility for providing what was proved by the evidence to be an old-fashioned system of working. If such a system as the Sheriff-substitute had found to be usual and reasonable had been adopted, no accident could have occurred from Gray's mistake. The rules had been violated. There was to be a protection for the shaft mouth, and the pitheadman was to see that no rails were to be led up to the mouth of the shaft "without some provision being made to prevent the waggons being pushed into the shaft." In the defenders' system there was nothing but the moveable block, which had at the time been removed, to serve as a protection. But in every good system there was a more efficient protection.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This accident happened in a simple way. An existing pit-shaft was being sunk to a greater depth in the defenders' colliery at Muiredge. When such work is being done the men are not lowered by means of a cage in the way usual during the working of a pit. They are lowered by what is called a "kettle." The kettle was at this pit laid upon a bogie, and the bogie was kept back from running on the rails to the mouth of the pit by a block or stops by which it could be stopped before reaching the "table" at the pit-mouth. This "table" was placed over the pit-mouth to receive the bogie with the kettle which it carried. The "kettle" was then raised off the bogie by means of a pulley, the "table" was removed, and the kettle let down into the pit.

Now, it was the duty of the pitheadman to attend and to see that if the table was not across the pit-mouth the block should not be removed. That was quite a simple duty. It required no skill, nothing but the attention of a careful workman. But on the occasion of this accident the pitheadman was standing at the pit-mouth with the covering table off it, when his lamp was blown out, and he was absent for a little time to get it lighted. When he came back he took off the block without recollecting that he had left the "table" off the pit-mouth, and then he ran the bogie and the kettle on to the unprotected space, and in consequence they fell down and killed M'Gill.

This being the nature of the accident, let me inquire as to the position of the defenders. They had contracted with Swan that he was to sink the shaft to a lower level. Swan was bound to "satisfy himself as to the condition and strength of all materials and tackling provided for him, it being understood that he may stop work till the necessary alterations or repairs are made." Now, the defenders handed over certain appliances for the work to their contractor, Swan. No objection was made to these, and to a certain extent that is real evidence that the appliances were according to the usual and known practice. But, in my view, it is unnecessary to discuss that subject, because on the evidence as to whether the apparatus was reasonably safe and sufficient for the work I think it to be proved that it was. The import of the evidence, in my view, is that something better can be used, and in some places is used. But it is not necessary even for an employer, in order to defend himself against such an action as the present, to shew that he has adopted every new invention and appliance, if that which he has used was adopted on the advice of persons of skill and experience who recommended it as safe and sufficient. Now here, giving my best consideration to the conflicting evidence, I consider that the appliances used were such as were quite usual, adopted and recommended by persons of skill. If the defenders, having erected these appliances for use, had asked a skilled engineer his opinion of them, I think that they would have been told that their appliances were usual and sufficient, and I see no reason to attribute to them fault. I cannot hold that they used appliances which no careful person would have employed.

I therefore conclude that no case of fault is proved against the defenders.

M'Gill v. Bowman & Co.

LORD YOUNG.—I also think that the judgment must be altered, and that the defenders should be assoilzied. I think the result of the evidence is that the system was reasonably safe.

The question whether the owner of appliances for the doing of a particular piece of work is culpable for the use of appliances of an old-fashioned description is always one of degree. I do not say that people are entitled to persevere with an old system which has by most others been abandoned as dangerous. But that being a question of degree, I think that these defenders were not called upon to change this system of appliances, inasmuch as it was reasonably safe, and inasmuch as persons who own such machinery are not absolutely bound to adopt the newest and most improved appliances.

That, as your Lordship has said, suffices for the disposal of the action. The immediate cause of the accident was the error of the pitheadman, and the defenders' appliances were reasonably safe, and they were not in breach of the rules of the Mines Regulation Act, or of any rule of the common law.

But I may also, I think, usefully express my views upon the other question, which was raised and argued to us. It is this. Swan was the person who contracted to sink this shaft to an additional depth. It was contained in his contract with the defenders that they should supply the apparatus for the work to his satisfaction. He was entitled to demand that they should do that. In the words of the contract, the contractor "must satisfy himself as to the condition and strength of all materials and tackling provided for him, it being understood that he may stop work till the necessary repairs or alterations are made." This apparatus was devised by Mr Landale. It was supplied to Swan. It seems to have been an apparatus to Swan's satisfaction. If he was of Landale's opinion, it was all that he was entitled to demand. Now, in these circumstances are the defenders subject to an action by Swan, or by anyone whose only right is derived through him? I think not. If I have painters to work in my house, and undertake to supply the ladders to the master's satisfaction, and do so, am I subject to an action by one of the painters if the ladders prove too weak? Surely not. I think that would be an entirely erroneous proposition. Yet it is involved in this action, and I think that we should negative it.

I think the action unwarrantable.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I think that the defenders should be assoilzied. But I proceed entirely upon the facts. I think that the appliances were reasonably safe and sufficient, and that none of the rules of the Mines Regulation Act were infringed.

LORD TRAYNER.—This action is based upon fault; there was no contract of any kind between the defenders and the deceased. The fault alleged against the defenders is that, whereas they were bound by their contract with Mr Swan (in whose employment the deceased was) to supply him with all the necessary and proper appliances for performing the contract work, they supplied improper appliances, which were not only old-fashioned but dangerous, with the consequence that the use thereof led to the deceased's death. I am satisfied on the evidence that the unfortunate death of the workman, whose representatives the pursuers are, did not arise from the fault of the defenders. The appliances, in themselves, were according to the evidence reasonably safe; they were not objected to by Swan or anyone else, and the defenders cannot therefore be held to have committed any breach of their contract with Swan. It is on an alleged breach of that contract, however, with its consequences, that the defenders' alleged fault depends. But I go further. It is, I think, clear that the death of the workman in question was not occasioned by any defect in the appliances furnished by the defenders. That occurrence was occasioned by the neglect and fault of the pitheadman. Had he exercised that care in the performance of his duty which he was bound to exercise, and which he might reasonably be expected to exercise, the occurrence would not have taken place. With due care the appliances in question would have been quite safe. I agree with Lord Young on both points.

THE COURT found in fact "that the death of Joseph M'Gill senior, husband of the pursuer Jane Buchanan or M'Gill, was not caused by fault or negligence on the part of the defenders: Therefore sustain the appeal; recall the judgments of the Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute appealed against; assoilzie the defenders."

Bankruptcy—Sequestration—Discharge—Appeal—Competency—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. 79), sec. 170.—In a petition in the Sheriff Court by a bankrupt for discharge, the Sheriff-substitute, by interlocutor of 1st October 1890, found the bankrupt entitled to his discharge and appointed him to make a declaration in terms of the statute. Thereafter the Sheriff-substitute, by interlocutor of 10th October, found the declaration made by the bankrupt satisfactory, and discharged him. On 15th October an objecting creditor appealed under the 170th * section of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856.

Held that although the appeal was competent as an appeal against the interlocutor of 10th October, it did not also submit to review the prior interlocutor of 1st October, which was a substantive judgment, and had become final as not having been appealed against within the period prescribed by the Act.

Bankruptcy—Sequestration—Discharge—Bankruptcy and Cessio (Scotland) Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. c. 22), sec. 6.—In a petition by a bankrupt for discharge, the Sheriff, after consideration of a report by the trustee that the bankruptcy had arisen from innocent misfortune, pronounced an interlocutor finding the bankrupt entitled to his discharge, and appointed him to make a declaration in terms of the statute. Thereafter the Sheriff pronounced an interlocutor in which he found the declaration satisfactory, and discharged the bankrupt. The Court refused the appeal, holding (1) that it was entirely within the Sheriff's discretion whether he should require the additional evidence on the question prescribed by subsection 2 of the 6th section of the Act; (2) that he might require such evidence at any time before actually discharging the bankrupt; and (3) that he must be assumed to have satisfied himself as to the facts referred to in the section before he granted the discharge.

Dec. 9, 1890. Alison v. Robertson's Trustees.

1st Division. Sheriff of Argyllshire. C.

On 16th July 1890 George Jamieson Alison, a partner of the firm of J. & A. Gardner & Company, quarrymasters near Ballachulish, whose estates, with those of the individual partners, had been sequestrated in May 1889, presented a petition craving his discharge. The petitioner stated that he had obtained the concurrence of a majority in number and two-thirds in value of the creditors, conform to minute of concurrence by the creditors and certificate by the trustee produced, that no dividend or composition had been paid in the sequestration, but that the failure to pay such dividend had arisen from circumstances for which he could not justly be held responsible, and that the trustee had, in terms of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, prepared a report, which was produced.

Objections to the discharge were lodged by the trustees of the deceased R. J. Robertson, W.S., who were bondholders on the estate of Lagnaha, in which the quarries let to the bankrupt firm of J. & A. Gardner & Company were situated, and creditors of that firm, and the individual partners thereof, in virtue of decrees obtained in an action of maills and duties raised by them on 21st April 1888.

The objectors averred, inter alia, that at and prior to the raising of the action of maills and duties the petitioner was insolvent, and during his insolvency had, with consent of his copartners, entered into certain collusive agreements in April 1888, by which he assigned the assets of the firm, including the lease of the quarries, which was a valuable asset, to Duncan Macgregor Gardner for the purpose of carrying through a composition arrangement under which a dividend of 7s. 6d. in the pound was to be paid to the creditors, and of conferring upon the partners material benefits. The objectors received no notice of this arrangement till 24th April 1888, and they had received no composition on their claim against the petitioner, though the other creditors had received a composition from Duncan Macgregor Gardner. They had, however, obtained payment from the latter of the rents and lordships due to them under decree in the action of maills and duties, amounting to £268, 5s. They were still creditors of the petitioner and his firm for the amount of the expenses of whose estates may be thereafter sequestrated—that is to say (1) A bankrupt shall not at any time be entitled to be discharged of his debts, unless it is proved to the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff, as the case may be, that one of the following conditions has been fulfilled—(a) That a dividend or composition of not less than 5s. in the pound has been paid out of the estate of the bankrupt, or that security for payment thereof has been found to the satisfaction of the creditors; or (b) that the failure to pay 5s. in the pound as aforesaid has, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff, as the case may be, arisen from circumstances for which the bankrupt cannot justly be held responsible. (2) In order to determine whether either of the foresaid conditions has been fulfilled, the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff, as the case may be, shall have power to require the bankrupt to submit such evidence as he may think necessary in addition to the declarations or oaths, as the case may be, made by the bankrupt under sections 140 and 147 of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. 79), and the report made by the trustee under section 146 of the said Act, and to allow any objecting creditor or creditors such proof as he may think right."

that action, being £33, 8s. 1d. The petitioner had not specified any innocent misfortune to account for his estate having paid no dividend.

The petitioner in answer admitted the execution of the agreements by which the assets of the firm were transferred to Duncan Macgregor Gardner, and explained that the objectors had not been informed of the agreements because at their dates the objectors had not entered into possession of the estate of Lagnaha, and so had not put themselves in the position of landlords and creditors of the petitioner's firm. It was not until 20th April 1889, ten days after the date of the second agreement, that the summons of maills and duties was signeted, and the petitioner had no knowledge that the objectors intended to raise such an action.

On 1st October 1890 the Sheriff-substitute (Maclachlan) after consideration of a report by the trustee in the sequestration to the effect that the bankrupt had complied with the provisions of the Act, and that his bankruptcy had arisen from innocent misfortunes, repelled the objections; found the bankrupt entitled to his discharge, but before granting the same, appointed him to appear and make a declaration in terms of the statute.

On 10th October the Sheriff-substitute having advised the declaration made by the petitioner found the same satisfactory, and discharged the petitioner.

The objectors on 15th October appealed under the 170th section of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856.

The petitioner objected to the competency of bringing up under this appeal the interlocutor of 1st October.

Argued for the petitioner;—The interlocutor of 1st October had not been appealed against within the period prescribed by the 170th section of the Act of 1856. No doubt it had been held in Pilling v. Drake[1] that an appeal against an interlocutor submitted also to review a prior interlocutor not appealed against. But the prior interlocutor there was a mere interlocutory order forming a step in the process. The judgment of 1st October was in an entirely different position. It was a substantive judgment upon which the whole case turned, and there was authority for holding that it could not be submitted to review.[2] It had required an express enactment in the Court of Session Act, 1868,* to give an appeal the effect of submitting to review prior interlocutors pronounced in a cause which had not been appealed against. That enactment, however, only applied to appeals which came in place of advocations, and it had no application to appeals in bankruptcy.

There was no force in the objection stated upon the merits to the later interlocutor, that it did not shew that the Sheriff had considered the provisions of the 6th section of the Act of 1881. It was quite clear that the Sheriff could not find the bankrupt entitled to his discharge under the prior interlocutor without first considering the provisions of the Act, and there was nothing to shew that he had not done so.[3]

Argued for the objectors;—(1) Although the appeal here had been taken per incuriam against the later interlocutor, it was competent as against both interlocutors. They were only two steps of one proceeding, and the appeal within the statutory period against the last interlocutor necessarily kept open the matters dealt with by the previous interlocutor. Though the Court of Session Act did not specially apply to bankruptcy appeals, it was according to the spirit of the enactment that it should be extended to them.

(2) On the Merits.—It did not appear from the Sheriff's interlocutor of 10th October that he had satisfied himself that the failure of the bankrupt to pay a dividend in the sequestration had arisen from circumstances for which he could not be held justly responsible. The Sheriff could at any time, before actually discharging the bankrupt, require additional evidence in order to satisfy himself on the point, and he was bound to be satisfied before he discharged the bankrupt. The averment of the objectors was that the bankrupt had collusively conveyed away the assets of the firm to a third party before the sequestration, and that he was not entitled to his discharge.

LORD PRESIDENT.—As regards the competency of this appeal, I am of opinion that it brings up quite regularly and properly for review by this Court the interlocutor of the 10th of October, for the appeal was lodged within the time prescribed by the statute. But I am just as clear that the appeal does not bring up for review the interlocutor of 1st October. The attempt to bring the appeal within section 69 of the Court of Session Act of 1868 is hopeless, because that provision is confined to appeals from the Sheriff Court which come in place of advocations, and has no application whatever to appeals in bankruptcy. The appeal here is made under the 170th section of the Act of 1856, and upon that section it must stand or fall.

Then we are told with reference to the interlocutor of 10th October, that the Sheriff-substitute has pronounced it without having considered the application to the case of the provisions contained in the 6th section of the Act of 1881. I can see no evidence of this, and there is no reason to suppose that he did not have in view the provisions applicable to the case before him. It seems to me there is just as much reason to say that he disregarded the provisions of the Act of 1856 as those of the Act of 1881. We are bound to assume that he took the provisions of both statutes into consideration in deciding on the course which he adopted on the 10th October.

Now, what the Act of 1881 provides by the 6th section is this:—"Notwithstanding anything contained in the Bankruptcy Act, the following provisions shall have effect with respect to bankrupts undischarged at the commencement of this Act and to bankrupts whose estates may be thereafter sequestrated,—that is to say, (1) a bankrupt shall not at any time be entitled to be discharged of his debts unless it is proved to the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff, as the case may be, that one of the following conditions has been fulfilled:—(a) That a dividend or composition of not less than 5s. in the pound has been paid out of the estate of the bankrupt, or that security for payment thereof has been found to the satisfaction of the creditors; or (b) that the failure to pay 5s. in the pound as aforesaid has, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff, as the case may be, arisen from circumstances for which the bankrupt cannot justly be held responsible."

The questions therefore which the Sheriff had to consider under that section were, first, the mere question of fact whether a dividend of 5s. in the pound had been paid by the bankrupt, and, second, whether his omission to pay it could be satisfactorily accounted for; and for the purpose of enabling the Sheriff to determine the questions, the 2d subsection of the 6th section goes on to give him certain powers,—"In order to determine whether either of the foresaid conditions has been fulfilled, the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff, as the case may be, shall have power to require the bankrupt to submit such evidence as he may think necessary, in addition to the declarations or oaths, as the case may be, made by the bankrupt under" various sections "of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, and the report made by the trustee under section 146 of the said Act, and to allow any objecting creditor or creditors such proof as he may think right."

Now, the whole matter of this inquiry under the 2d subsection is in the discretion of the Sheriff. If he has before him, without further inquiry, enough to satisfy his mind that the non-payment of a dividend of 5s. in the pound has not arisen from circumstances for which the bankrupt is to be held justly responsible, he is entitled to proceed to give the bankrupt his discharge. He is not bound upon the application of the objecting creditors to allow a proof at large, first to the creditors and then to the bankrupt. The matter is entirely in his own discretion.

In the present case I am not going to give an opinion as to whether the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor is right or wrong upon the merits. All I say is, that the matter is left to his discretion by the statute, and it appears to me that probably he had very good grounds for being satisfied that the failure to pay 5s. in the pound in the sequestration did not arise from circumstances for which the bankrupt could justly be held responsible. It is quite admitted, indeed, that when the bankrupt found he was insolvent he executed a private trust-deed for behoof of his creditors, under which he arranged to pay all his creditors 7s. 6d. in the pound. The objectors, the appellants, were not at that time in the position of creditors of the bankrupt. They held a security over the entire estate, of which the quarries formed part, but they had not at that time raised the action of maills and duties necessary to make them creditors, and therefore 7s. 6d. in the pound was not set apart for them. Under the action of maills and duties, however, they afterwards recovered payment of their debt in full, though not of the costs of the action. They were therefore in at least as favourable a position as any other creditor of the bankrupt, and it would seem rather hard upon the bankrupt to say that such circumstances as I have detailed make him responsible for a dividend of 5s. in the pound not having been paid in the sequestration, and that, though a dividend of 7s. 6d. in the pound was secured to the creditors under the private trust-deed, the provisions of section 6 of the Act of 1881 were not complied with because a dividend of 5s. was not paid under the sequestration.

The Sheriff-substitute held apparently that he had quite sufficient information before him to enable him to dispose of the question without further inquiry, and in my opinion he was quite entitled to act upon it.

I do not think it is necessary to go into the argument submitted to us as to the time at which the Sheriff is bound to consider the matters referred to him under the Act of 1881. But I may say that I entirely concur in the view expressed by Lord Kinnear in the course of the discussion, that at any time before the discharge is actually granted the Sheriff is entitled to say,—"Here is something which is unexplained, and there must be an inquiry upon the subject," and if the Sheriff is not satisfied upon full inquiry that the failure to pay 5s. has not been due to circumstances for which the bankrupt can be held justly responsible, he is entitled at any time before the discharge is actually granted, to institute an inquiry in order to satisfy his mind as to how the matter stands.

No. 47.

Dec. 9, 1890.
Alison v. Robertson's Trustees.

I am therefore in favour of holding that the appeal is incompetent as regards the interlocutor of 1st October, and that as regards the interlocutor of the 10th October the appeal must be refused, because it deals with a matter which is left to the discretion of the Sheriff.

LORD ADAM.—I agree in thinking that this appeal is competent so far as regards the interlocutor of 10th October, but that the effect of the appeal is not to submit to review by this Court the interlocutor of 1st October.

I think the interlocutor of 1st October is a substantive judgment which, in terms of the 170th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, requires to be appealed against within eight days. If that is not done, the interlocutor becomes final, and it is incompetent for us to inquire into the reasons in respect of which the Sheriff has found the bankrupt is entitled to his discharge.

That being so, I think, nevertheless, that it is competent for us to inquire whether or not the judgment of 10th October is well founded.

All that is said against this interlocutor on the merits is that the Sheriff had not in view the provisions of section 6 of the Act of 1881, which requires that, before he gets his discharge, a bankrupt must pay a dividend of 5s. in the pound, unless his failure to pay such dividend has arisen from circumstances for which he cannot justly be held responsible.

Now, the only ground upon which it is suggested that the Sheriff has not taken that provision into consideration is that there is no finding to that effect in his interlocutor of 10th October. But I can see no proof at all that the Sheriff has not taken the provision into consideration, and that he has not done what he ought to have done. It was perfectly competent for the Sheriff, notwithstanding the interlocutor of 1st October, before granting the bankrupt his actual discharge, to consider any matters which might have occurred subsequently or otherwise, and therefore he was quite entitled, notwithstanding that interlocutor, before he pronounces the interlocutor of 10th October, if he thought it necessary in the circumstances, to have called upon the bankrupt to produce evidence in addition to his declaration on oath, that his failure to pay the dividend was not a matter for which he could be held justly to be responsible. There was no difficulty in the Sheriff requiring such additional evidence, and it is pretty evident that he did not do so because he had dealt with that question raised by section 6 of the Act of 1881 before pronouncing the interlocutor of 1st October. It was quite within the Sheriff's discretion to require additional evidence or not from the bankrupt, and we cannot interfere with his decision on that matter.

LORD M'LAREN and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Refuse the appeal as incompetent, so far as it seeks to submit to review the interlocutor of 1st October 1890: Further refuse the appeal as an appeal against the interlocutor of the 10th October, and decern."

WILLIAM WILSON M'BRIDE AND ANOTHER, Defenders (Reclaimers).—Murray—Salvesen.

BURGH OF IRVINE, Defenders.—Strachan—Macfarlane.

JAMES WYLLIE, Defender.

Succession—Deathbed—Reduction—Title to sue.—A woman, by antenuptial contract conveyed her whole heritable and moveable estate to trustees, to hold it for her liferent use, or in the event of her husband's survivance, for his liferent use, and lastly, for the use and behoof of the child or children who might be procreated of her body, declaring that after the death of the survivor of the spouses the "trustees shall pay over or assign the trust-funds and estate to the lawful child or children of the said" wife, the wife having a power of appointment, or failing her the surviving husband. It was also to be "lawful and competent" to the wife, whom failing, to the husband, "to restrict, if she or he shall see cause, the right of any of the said children to the liferent merely of their provisions, and to secure the principal to their lawful issue, or failing such issue, to the other children" of the wife, "declaring that the share of each child shall vest and become payable on the death of" the survivor of the spouses, "and on each of the said children attaining the age of twenty-one years complete or being married."

The wife died in 1868, predeceasing her husband. There was one child of the marriage, a daughter. The wife had on deathbed executed along with her husband a mutual disposition and settlement, whereby they respectively conveyed their whole estates to the survivor.

In 1889 the daughter raised against her father and various disponees from him an action for reduction ex capite lecti of the mutual disposition and settlement, and of the deeds following thereon. Held (rev. judgment of Lord Trayner) that the pursuer's interest as heir was excluded by the marriage-contract, under which her right might at her father's pleasure be reduced to a liferent, and therefore that she had no title to sue.

2D DIVISION. Lord Trayner. M.

MARGARET GARDNER WYLLIE, only child of the marriage between James Wyllie and Margaret Gardner or Wyllie, and Joseph Campbell Penney, C.A., judicial factor on the trust-estate created by an antenuptial contract of Mr and Mrs Wyllie, raised an action of reduction ex capite lecti of a mutual disposition and settlement made by Mr and Mrs Wyllie on 21st April 1868, and of another mutual disposition and settlement by them on 4th May 1868, against James Wyllie, and certain persons to whom he had granted dispositions of and bonds over subjects embraced in the marriage-contract.

Mrs Wyllie died on 10th May 1868. The pursuer's ground of reduction was that these deeds were executed when she was on her deathbed, to the prejudice of the pursuer Margaret Gardner Wyllie, who would otherwise have been entitled to succeed under the marriage-contract. A number of other deeds proceeding upon the mutual disposition second mentioned were also brought under reduction, but it is unnecessary in view of the judgment now reported to refer to these in detail.

Mr and Mrs Wyllie were married on 30th December 1865. Mrs Wyllie was possessed of heritable property in Irvine. Prior to their marriage they executed a marriage-contract. By this contract, inter alia, Mrs Wyllie conveyed to trustees her whole estate, heritable and moveable, for the following purposes, viz., (1) her own liferent; (2) in the event, which happened, of her husband's survivance, for his alimentary liferent, under burden of educating and maintaining any children of the marriage, "Lastly, For the use and behoof of the child or children who may be procreated of the body of the said Miss Margaret Gardner, declaring that after the death of the survivor of the said James Wyllie and Margaret Gardner, the said trustees shall pay over or assign the trust funds and estate to the lawful child or children of the said Margaret Gardner in such proportions, at such time, and under such conditions as she shall by any deed under her hand direct, and failing such deed, and in the event of the said James Wyllie surviving the said Margaret Gardner, as he shall by any deed under his hand direct, and failing such direction by either, then the said trustees shall divide and apportion the trust funds and estate among the children of the said Margaret Gardner equally, share and share alike, and it shall be lawful and competent to the said Margaret Gardner, whom failing, to the said James Wyllie, to restrict, if she or he shall see cause, the right of any of the said children to the liferent merely of their provisions and to secure the principal to their lawful issue, or, failing such issue, to the other children of the said Margaret Gardner; declaring that the share of each child shall vest and become payable on the death of the survivor of the said James Wyllie and Margaret Gardner, and on each of the said children attaining the age of twenty-one years complete or being married."

The marriage-contract was never recorded in the Register of Sasines, and was never intimated to the trustees named in it.

The pursuer, the only child of the marriage, was born on 23d September 1866.

On 21st April 1868, when Mrs Wyllie was ill of the disease of which she died, the mutual settlement first brought under reduction was executed by her and her husband. It was prepared by Mr M'Jannet, solicitor, who was unacquainted with the terms of the marriage-contract. It was inconsistent with the marriage-contract, and on Mr M'Jannet becoming acquainted with the nature of the marriage-contract he advised Wyllie that it was an irrevocable deed, and that the mutual settlement was ineffectual in competition with it. Wyllie then induced another solicitor, who had prepared the marriage-contract, to prepare the mutual disposition and settlement of 4th May 1868, which was the second deed brought under reduction. It was executed within six days of Mrs Wyllie's death. By it each of the spouses, for love, favour, and affection toward the other, conveyed to the survivor of them absolutely, and to the heirs and assignees whomsoever of the survivor, and failing them both by death, to the child of the marriage the whole estate, heritable and moveable, of the first deceaser.

After the death of Mrs Wyllie, on 10th May 1868, Wyllie made up his title by notarial instrument, proceeding upon the mutual disposition and settlement of 4th May, to his wife's heritable property. He proceeded to burden and sell parts of the subjects.

In July 1889 the action of reduction was brought, the defenders called being James Wyllie, the pursuer's father (who did not appear), and Jane Boyd, William Wilson M'Bride, and the Corporation of Irvine, who all derived right through deeds granted by him, and who appeared to oppose decree of reduction.

The pursuers pleaded;—1. The said mutual trust-dispositions and settlements, being the deeds first and second libelled in the summons prefixed hereto, ought to be reduced on the ground (1) that it was ultra vires of the parties thereto to grant or execute the same in the circumstances set forth in the foregoing condescendence, and (2) that they were granted in lecto. 2. The remaining deeds libelled, proceeding as they do upon a deed which is void or voidable, are themselves reducible, and ought to be reduced as craved, with expenses as concluded for.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia, that the action was irrelevant.

Wyllie v. M'Bride.

A proof was taken before answer.

On 6th June 1890, at the close of the proof, the defender M'Bride obtained leave to add a plea of "No title to sue."

On 18th June 1890 the Lord Ordinary (Trayner) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the mutual settlements, dated respectively 21st April 1868 and 4th May 1868, being the writs first and second described and called for in the conclusions of the summons, were executed by the late Mrs Margaret Gardner or Wyllie on deathbed, and that the said Mrs Margaret Gardner or Wyllie was labouring, at the dates of said deeds respectively, under the disease of which she died: Therefore finds, reduces, decerns, and declares in terms of the conclusions of the summons." *

* "OPINION.—On 16th December 1865 the defender James Wyllie and the late Mrs Margaret Gardner or Wyllie entered into and executed an antenuptial contract of marriage, by which, inter alia, Mrs Wyllie conveyed to certain trustees named all sums of money and property of every description, heritable and moveable, then belonging to her, or which she might acquire in any manner of way whatever. The trustees were directed to hold the estate so conveyed to them for the following purposes:—(1) For the liferent use of Mrs Wyllie; (2) for the liferent use of her husband should he survive her; and (3) for the use and behoof of the child or children who might be procreated of the body of Mrs Wyllie; 'declaring that, after the death of the survivor of the said James Wyllie and Margaret Gardner, the said trustees shall pay over or assign the trust funds and estate to the lawful child or children of the said Margaret Gardner.' There was a power reserved to the spouses to apportion the estate among the children, but, as there was only one child born of the marriage, there was no room for the exercise of that power. There was also a power reserved to Mrs Wyllie, whom failing, to her husband, to restrict, if she or he should see cause, the right of any of the said children to the liferent merely of their provisions, and to secure the principal to their lawful issue, or, failing such issue, to the other children of Mrs Wyllie. This power was not exercised by Mrs Wyllie, and has not been exercised hitherto by Mr Wyllie.

"This contract of marriage remained after its execution, until shortly before Mrs Wyllie's death (which occurred on 10th May 1868), in the hands of the agent who had prepared it, and who acted as law-agent and factor for Mrs Wyllie from the period of her marriage until her death. Its existence was never intimated to the trustees therein named. The same law-agent prepared a mutual deed of settlement by Mr and Mrs Wyllie, which was executed by them on 4th May 1868, whereby they, and each of them, conveyed to the survivor 'absolutely, and the heirs and assignees whomsoever of the survivor,' the whole estate, heritable and moveable, now owing and belonging, or that shall be owing and belonging, to the first deceaser. At the date of the execution of that mutual settlement Mrs Wyllie was on her deathbed, as was well enough known both to Mr Wyllie and the law-agent. It was a mutual settlement only in form, for at its date Mr Wyllie had no estate to convey, and the sole purpose for which that deed was executed was to confer on Mr Wyllie a right to the estate, which under the marriage-contract had been conveyed to trustees for behoof of his child. Following upon the foresaid mutual settlement, Mr Wyllie made up a title to the heritable estate of his wife, and has disponed or burdened it by the several writs mentioned in the summons.

"The pursuer Margaret Gardner Wyllie, the only child born of the said marriage, now seeks to set aside the foresaid mutual settlement, ex capite lecti, as being to her prejudice, as heir of her mother and heir of provision under the marriage-contract. There is no doubt about the fact that the deed in question was executed on deathbed, and that it is to the pursuer's prejudice. But there are two defences stated in bar of the pursuer's obtaining decree of reduction which have been urged upon me, and of which I have now to dispose.

"The first of these is that the pursuer has no title to sue—a defence only

Wyllie v. M'Bride.

M'Bride reclaimed, and argued;—He was a stranger who acquired the subjects from Wyllie for onerous causes, and on the faith of the records. It was proposed in this action to reduce his title in consequence of an objection founded on the law of deathbed, a ground of reduction now abolished by an Act of 1871.* Such an objection—though the law of deathbed existed when Mrs Wyllie died—was to be narrowly scanned. No one but the heir had a right to reduce on the ground of deathbed. But the pursuer Miss Wyllie was not heir. Her character as such was excluded by the marriage-contract. Under that deed her parents or the surviving father were entitled to restrict her right to a liferent, and she had no vested right of fee till the surviving parent died without having executed any such deed of restriction. If there had been several children, the pursuer could have been, in the exercise of her parents' right of appointment under the contract, cut out of all right under the contract.† The heir must be the heir alioquin successurus, and must have both a title and interest to reduce ex capite lecti.[1] Mr Bell said,[2]—"The general rule is that the plea of deathbed is competent to the heir who, alioquin successurus, is entitled to be served but for the deathbed deed."

Argued for the pursuer;—The pursuer was heir of her mother, and was not displaced from that position by the contract of marriage. Mrs Wyllie stated by the defender M'Bride after the proof in the case had been concluded. The main argument submitted in support of this defence was, that the pursuer is not heir of provision under the marriage-contract, but only a beneficiary having a claim against the trustees, who are the disponees therein, and that the reduction of the mutual settlement would set up the conveyance in the marriage-contract in favour of the trustees to the exclusion of the pursuer. Of course, if the reduction of the mutual settlement had the effect of setting up a title in somebody else which was adverse to and exclusive of the heir's right, the heir would have no title to reduce. But the reduction of the settlement, and consequent restoration of the conveyance under the marriage-contract, so far from being adverse to or exclusive of the pursuer, is, on the contrary, the restoration of her right. The trustees only hold for her, and are bound to convey to her at a certain time. Holding only for behoof of the pursuer, the trustees, in my opinion, are not the singular successors of the late Mrs Wyllie; at all events, as it is a question with the pursuer. They are the medium through which Mrs Wyllie hands over her property to the pursuer; they have no right of property directly at all which they could exercise to the pursuer's prejudice. To set up their title, therefore, as trustees is not setting up any title or right adverse to or exclusive of the pursuer's. Nor is the pursuer a mere beneficiary under the marriage-contract in the sense in which a legatee is a beneficiary under a will. Her right is conferred by an onerous deed which destines the heritage thereby conveyed to her. The interposition of a trust does not make her any the less the heir of provision.

"It was pointed out that Mr Wyllie had the power to restrict the pursuer's right to a liferent, and to confer the fee on her children. I do not regard this as of importance. Mr Wyllie, in point of fact, has not exercised this power, and may never do so. Whether he would now be allowed to do so, after his attempt to defraud the heir under the marriage-contract, may be a question. But as matters at present stand, no restriction has been placed on the right of fee conferred on the pursuer by the marriage-contract.

"I am therefore of opinion that the plea of no title should be repelled. . . ."

had divested herself by the marriage-contract, and the trustees under the marriage-contract held for the daughter, and no deed had been executed to limit her right. Even though the heir's right were contingent, she had still a right to reduce, for this privilege of reduction was for the protection of all kinds of heirs, so that successions previously settled might not be disturbed on deathbed.[1] The case of Shaw v. Campbell, quoted on the other side, was really decided on another point. The pursuer Miss Wyllie was entitled to use her character as heir to support her right under the deed. Her right to the heritage might be defeasible to a certain extent, but that would not exclude her title.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—James Wyllie and the now deceased Margaret Gardner or Wyllie, his wife, executed an antenuptial contract in 1865. By that contract the wife conveyed to trustees her whole estate then belonging to her, or which she might acquire. The purposes of this conveyance by her were her own life rent, excluding the husband's legal rights, the husband's liferent in the event of his survivance of her, and lastly, "for the use and behoof of the child or children who may be procreated of the body of the said Miss Margaret Gardner." A power of appointment was reserved to Mrs Wyllie, and failing such deed by Mr Wyllie, and it was declared that it should be lawful to her, whom failing to him, to restrict the share of any child to a liferent, and it was also declared that the share of each child should vest and become payable on the death of the last survivor of the spouses.

The marriage was dissolved by the death of Mrs Wyllie in 1868. The only child of the marriage was the pursuer, who was born in 1866. Mrs Wyllie did not attempt to exercise any of the reserved powers, but it appears that a few days before she died, and when she was fatally ill, she was induced by her husband, in defraud of the marriage-contract, to execute along with him "mutual disposition and settlement," by which each conveyed, "in favour of the survivor of us absolutely, and to the heirs and assignees of the survivor, and failing us both by death, to the child or children of our marriage," the whole estate of the first deceaser.

It is a remarkable fact that this mutual settlement was prepared by the same agent who prepared the antenuptial marriage-contract, and it is a fact not very creditable to that agent. Proceeding in virtue of that mutual disposition, Mr Wyllie, after her death, made up a title to the heritable estate which had belonged to his wife, and subsequently he proceeded to dispose of that property. It has now been in possession of others who purchased it for a considerable time. One of the questions which at the outset appeared to be raised by the defences was whether this reduction was not excluded by prescriptive possession on the part of the defenders, but I think that in the course of the argument it came to be agreed that that defence was untenable. The question whether the pursuer can prevail in this reduction depends, in the first place, upon her legal position under the antenuptial contract of marriage. The doctrine of the law of deathbed was that the heir of the person who granted a deathbed deed had a right to set aside on the ground that it was to his prejudice in his character as heir. But it has never been held that a person had the power to reduce ex capite lecti who had only a possible fee in the event of the proprietor dying without executing a deed by which it was in his power to deprive him of that fee. Now, what is the pursuer's right from which she derives her alleged title to reduce ex capite lecti? It depends upon the marriage-contract. But under that contract her right in the trust funds might be reduced to a liferent by her father and her mother together, or by either of them who may survive the other. The right is one which is contingent. In these circumstances, I think therefore she had no title to reduce ex capite lecti the deeds which she seeks to reduce, and therefore that it is not competent to her to insist in this action. I move your Lordships therefore to recall the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary and assoilzie the defenders.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I suppose this is the last judgment that will be pronounced upon the law of deathbed. I agree in the result at which your Lordship has arrived. The pursuer is heir. But I think that her interest as such is excluded by the marriage-contract.

White v. Briggs.

Copyright—Advertising pamphlet—Drawings.—The manufacturer of a certain kind of cement for increasing the strength of walls and rendering them damp-proof, issued a pamphlet of twelve pages by way of advertisement, in which were set forth the virtues of his cement, the different kinds of construction to which it was applicable, and the method of applying it. This pamphlet, which was registered under the Copyright Act (5 and 6 Vict. c. 45), contained a drawing of a double brick wall, consisting of two single brick walls with a small space between them, with an iron tray inclined on the top of one of the walls to guide the cement into the cavity between the two.

Another manufacturer issued a single leaflet setting forth the virtues of his cement for increasing the strength of walls and rendering them damp-proof. He mentioned several kinds of construction to which it was applicable, which had been mentioned by the other manufacturer, and to illustrate the method of application he gave a drawing of a brick wall at the same angle of perspective, with the same number of courses of bricks, and with a tray inclined on its top at the same angle and with the same supports as in the other person's drawing.

The former manufacturer having brought an action of interdict on the ground of infringement of his copyright in the pamphlet, held that the nature and extent of the similarity between the text and the illustration of the two advertisements were not such as to constitute any infringement of copyright.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Forfarshire. J.

WILLIAM WHITE, Great Western Works, Abergavenny, who held a patent for "An improved method or manner of building walls so as to render them damp-proof and to increase their strength," issued as an advertisement a pamphlet consisting of twelve pages of descriptive matter and laudation of the method said to have been invented by him, and twenty-eight pages of testimonials. This pamphlet was registered under the Copyright Act (5 and 6 Vict. c. 45). He titled his pamphlet "White's Hygeian Rock Building Composition, rendering walls damp-proof, increasing the strength of walls, reducing the cost of walls." He stated that his composition "fulfils three of the greatest desiderata in building walls, viz., damp-proofness, strength, and economy. . . . For the walls of large reservoirs, swimming-baths, gas-holder tanks, sea-walls, basement and cellar walls, damp courses, and similar constructions, . . . a wall constructed with this composition is unrivalled. . . . A wall built two half bricks on the flat is much stronger then an eighteen inch wall built in the ordinary way. . . . By its use great economy can be effected. . . . A cwt. will fill in about 2½ yards superficial, half inch thick."

White gave several sketches in his pamphlet, among them one of a "cavity wall," i.e., a double wall with a narrow cavity between the two brick sides, into which the cement was to be poured. The drawing shewed one side with four courses of bricks, the other side a course higher, the cavity between the two sides and a tray inclined or tilted towards the cavity to guide the liquid cement into it. This description was appended to the drawing, viz., "in pouring the composition into the cavity it is of great advantage to use a small chair, constructed of sheet iron, to lead the composition into the cavity."

William Briggs, Arbroath, a rival manufacturer of cement, issued an advertisement on a single sheet, with the heading,—"Healthy Houses—Damp-proof Building Rock Composition." The leaflet set forth as regarded the composition,—"One cwt. fills in about 2½ superficial yards at half-inch thick. It renders brick walls, &c. perfectly damp-proof, and greatly increases their strength. So much is this the case that a wall built two half-bricks on the flat, with Tenax" (the composition) "run in is much stronger than an 18-inch wall built in the usual way, making its use very economical . . . It is specially suited for cellar and basement walls, damp courses, reservoirs, tanks, swimming-baths, &c." At the top of the leaflet was a drawing of a brick wall at the same angle of perspective as the drawing in White's pamphlet, shewing, like it, a double wall with four courses of bricks on one side, and five on the other, with a slit between for the insertion of cement, and a tray tilted towards the slit at the same angle as in White's drawing, and supported as in it by two wedges. Appended to this drawing was "The above illustration requires no explanation except that the arrangement to lead the composition into the cavity of the wall is a simple construction of light sheet iron."

White raised an action against Briggs to interdict him from reprinting and publishing and circulating his pamphlet or portions thereof, or colourable imitations thereof. He pleaded his copyright.

The defender denied that he had copied the pursuer's pamphlet, and pleaded;—(2) The pursuer having no valid copyright in the series of pamphlets founded on, the action falls to be dismissed. (3) Assuming the pursuer to have a copyright in the pamphlets referred to, the defender not having infringed same is entitled to be assoilzied.

In the course of a proof which was led the defender deponed,—"I am not prepared to say that the design on my leaflet was not made by taking the design of the 'chair' at the bottom of one page of the pursuer's pamphlet and putting it on another design in the middle of the same page. There is a phrase on page 7 of the pursuer's pamphlet ("a wall built two half bricks," &c.), identical with the phrase occurring in the first red paragraph in my leaflet. It is the same, with the exception that my trade-mark (Tenax) is introduced. I am not prepared to say that the phrase in my leaflet was not taken from the pursuer's pamphlet. My son wrote the words in my leaflet. I use the same enumeration of objects for which my patent is applied as the pursuer does. It is impossible to do otherwise."

The Sheriff-substitute (Robertson), on 22d July 1890, found in fact "That the pursuer has patented an invention which claims to be original, and by which brick walls are consolidated and rendered damp-proof: That, with a view to introduce and advertise his invention, the pursuer has printed and circulated the pamphlet, piracy of which is complained of: That this pamphlet is of no literary value or merit apart from the invention which it advertises: That the defender also claims to have invented a similar process, and has circulated the notices complained of with a view to introduce and advertise his process: Finds, in fact and law, that in so doing the defender has not infringed any copyright in the pursuer's pamphlet: Therefore refuses the prayer of the petition, under reservation of the pursuer's right to proceed against the defender for an infringement of patent, by injunction, interdict, or otherwise, as he may be advised."*

* "NOTE.— . . . I have no doubt a pamphlet may be the subject of copyright. The term 'book,' used in the Act, includes 'catalogues, tracts, abridgments, digests, expensive designs, and the like, so long as these claim to be original, and to be the product of mental effort apart from mere advertisement.'

"In the case of Hotten v. Arthur, 1863, 1 H. and M. 603, a bookseller's catalogue was protected by the Court because short anecdotes or descriptions of the books were appended to the catalogues. As V.-C. Page Wood remarked, these were the product of mental exertion, and the publisher had a right of property in them apart from the books which they described. In the case of Macfarlane, 10 R. 801, a trade book of designs was made the subject of protection, and the Court allowed a proof of the piracy, the designs being very costly and having been all made from original castings or patterns in the possession of the publisher. In the same way a cemetery stone mason who published a book of monumental designs taken from tombstones was held to be entitled to protection. But an ordinary advertisement which has no value or use except to make known the kind of business of the advertiser is not within the scope of the copyright law—Copinger, page 97. Perhaps the case of Cobbett v. Woodward, 1872, L. R., 14 Eq. 407, best illustrates the principles of copyright law. Lord Romilly says, 'Wherever letterpress bears the trace of original composition it is entitled to protection, but not where it simply describes the contents of a warehouse, the exertions of the proprietor, or the common mode of using familiar things.'

"In short, unless the pursuer's pamphlet has some value apart from its use as a mere advertising medium, I do not think it can fairly come within the scope of copyright protection. I have carefully read the pursuer's pamphlet. It may be described as a trade circular or intimation, partaking largely of the nature of an advertisement, and it explains a patent invention by which brick walls are consolidated and rendered damp-proof. This is done by pouring a cement between two brick walls built parallel to and within an inch of each other, and several drawings of walls illustrate the modus operandi of the invention. There is no literary merit or value in the pamphlet apart from the invention. And the drawings are only original in so far as they illustrate the patent, being merely figures of brick walls drawn in perspective. In the absence of all literary effort, whether poetic, dramatic, historical, or inventive, there is really nothing to steal or pirate except the idea of the patent itself. There are no smart pictures or jeux d'esprit; nothing which corresponds to the jocular and artistic originalities connected with Pears' Soap, for example, or to the playful allusion to Darkest Africa, which promotes the sale of Nubian Blacking. These are clever designs, combined with witty ideas, which have cost some thought and trouble apart from soap and blacking. The young gentleman who 'won't be happy till he gets it,' and the young lady who was 'washed ashore' by soap, are amusing trade designs, which I can quite suppose no one can appropriate or make use of in selling

White v. Brigga.

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—This was not a case of innocent coincidence, but of wilful imitation, and as such should be interdicted.[1] The three topics for consideration by the Court were (1) the quantity taken,[2] (2) the collocation of the words taken, and (3) the purpose for which they were taken. Thus one publishing a cookery book would not infringe the copyright of one who had written a book of travels in China by quoting a description of some Chinese dish he had seen prepared by the natives.[3] The three elements were all present here to prove an intention of piracy. The criterion taken by the Sheriff, viz., "literary merit," was no criterion at all. A bad book was protected as well as a good book. A mere advertisement, no literary another soap. But in the present case there is nothing of that sort, and I have great doubts whether the Copyright Act applies. But even if it does, and even if the pamphlet is entitled to protection, has the defender pirated it? Assuming that he has discovered a cement also, perhaps a cheaper and better one, how is he to describe it and the method of using it except by using English words and terms which are necessarily similar to those used by the pursuer? I quote, for example, the following line of the pursuer's pamphlet: 'A cwt. will fill in about 2½ yards superficial, half-inch thick.' The pursuer complains that the defender says exactly the same of his cement. Now, unless the pursuer is to be the only person in the world who is to be allowed to deal with a hydraulic mixture of this particular consistency and specific gravity, I fail to see any harm in the defender saying that his cement will cover a certain superficial area also; and if the pursuer is to be the only person in the world entitled to use this cement, then he must proceed against the defender for infringing his patent, not for pirating his pamphlet. The pursuer also complains that the defender uses his cement on the same subjects as are detailed in the pamphlet, such as 'reservoirs,' 'baths,' 'tanks,' 'basement walls,' and 'damp courses.' Surely the pursuer has no copyright in printing these words. In the same way I regard the illustrations. These are merely figures of brick walls. The pursuer complains that the defender's figure of a brick wall has the same number of bricks in it, and is drawn at the same angle of perspective as his own. But these figures are nothing in themselves, except as illustrating the invention. I fancy anyone may draw a figure of a brick wall, even at the same angle as the pursuer has done, and with the same number of bricks in it. But in doing so, if he illustrates as his own a patented idea of another man's, then an action for infringement of patent will lie against him; but not surely one for infringement of copyright in a brick wall at a certain angle, and with so many bricks in it. So that, in regard to the line above quoted and the figure of the brick wall, in my opinion the pursuer might just as well claim copyright in the multiplication table or in the figure of a square.

"I think the pursuer has mistaken his remedy. He ought to proceed against the defender for infringement of the patent, as threatened by his solicitor in May 1889. Whether he will succeed or not I cannot say; but according to Stubbs' Directory for the United Kingdom I see there are upwards of fifty makers of cements in London, and sixty more in the provinces, so that the pursuer may have some trouble.

"I cannot better sum up this case than in the words of Lord Selborne, in Singer Manufacturing Company v. Loog, 1882, L. R., 8 App. Cases, 15. He says, 'If the defender has a right to make and sell articles similar to the pursuer's he has a right to say so, and to employ the terminology common in his trade, if he does this in a fair, distinct, and unequivocal way.'" work at all, was protected;[1] so was a directory,[2] or a publication of the bill of entry of the custom-house.[3]

Argued for the defender;—In deciding questions of this sort the Court must "look to the nature and objects of the selection made, the quantity and value of the material used, and the degree to which the use may prejudice the sale or diminish the profits, or supersede the objects of the original work."[4] One author was entitled to use the work of another, unless he thereby did injury to the original author in respect of his work.[5] Tried by that standard the pursuer here could shew no injury done to him. But beyond that there had been no piracy. Persons having a common idea to express must express it in words very much alike.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—As this matter is presented to us, no case is made on behalf of the complainer that the respondent in the work he is doing, or in the way in which he is doing it, is infringing any right of his. The complainer and the respondent both have a mode of building walls by which, as they say, they produce better walls.

The only question we have to consider is whether in the advertisement or leaflet issued by the respondent he has infringed any right of copyright in the complainer's pamphlet.

The case for the complainer is that there has been an improper appropriation of sentences used by White in his pamphlet. I have looked with care at these sentences, and I am satisfied that there is nothing in the advertisement which is objectionable on that ground. The purpose they both have in view makes it necessary that the same language—common language with no peculiarities about it—should be used. There is nothing of the nature of an infringement of copyright in anything that is said. The use by the respondent of such ordinary terms as "damp-proof" to express the quality of his productions, or of "swimming baths," "reservoirs," or "tanks," to describe the kind of things that will be improved by the adoption of his method of construction, cannot give rise to an interdict on the footing of an infringement of copyright having been committed.

But then there is a drawing in Briggs' leaflet. There are two things he wishes to represent in that drawing,—the first is that in building a wall under his process you are to have two walls of the thickness of a single brick with a slit between them for the insertion of cement; the second is a tray which is to guide the cement into the slit. Both White and Briggs give directions how the cement is to be used. It cannot be said that Briggs is not entitled to use that mode. If he is to shew at all how it is to be used, I cannot see how it can be shewn otherwise than he has shewn it. The complainer's drawings represents nothing that is at all difficult to copy. In such cases, as was admitted from the bar, the whole question is one of degree, and when it became necessary to appeal to the case of Kelly as the nearest illustration his counsel could get of the law having interfered to prevent the adoption by one person of ordinary material, which anyone with time and trouble could collect or make as well as any other, it was so evident that the copying here, if any took place at all, was the merest trifle, that it was plain that the complainer's case was hopeless.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. There is here no question of patent, neither is there any case of a colourable imitation of the complainer's commodity, or of anything done to palm off the respondent's article as the complainer's article.

Therefore, adopting the language of Lord Selborne cited by the Sheriff-substitute, I observe that the respondent had a right to make and sell this article.

There is only one way of using this article—this cement. But it is said that, in informing his customers how it is to be used, the defender has employed the same language as the complainer has used to instruct his customers. In the use of that language I am clearly of opinion that there was no infringement of copyright.

But it is also said that the defender has copied a drawing of a brick wall which the pursuer had used to illustrate his meaning. There is no copyright in the drawing of a brick wall. There is nothing original in the drawing of a brick wall used to illustrate the application of this cement, any more than there would be in the drawing of a hat, or a snuff-box, or a tobacco-pipe, or an umbrella, used for the purpose of pointing out how a band is to be put on the hat, or something done to the box, the pipe, or the umbrella. There is no copyright in that. There is no copyright in a bit of brick wall. Copyright is foreign to the case.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am content to dispose of this case on the facts, and to hold that in fact there has been no invasion of the pursuer's rights.

LORD TRAYNER.—I am of the same opinion as your Lordships. The defender was entitled to describe in the language he thought best suited for his purpose this cement and the mode of applying it, and it is out of the question to hold that, because he has used the same language as another maker of cement, who is using it for the same purposes, he has thereby infringed that latter's copyright.

As regards the illustration, I think that there is no such adoption, in quantity or in quality, of the complainer's work as to justify an interdict. The question appears to me to be de minimis.

THE COURT found "in fact in terms of the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor," and refused the appeal.

dren, that it was not competent to appoint the mother as factor loco tutoris to them, as she was already by operation of the above enactment their tutor.

DUNCAN CAMPBELL WILLISON died on 10th December 1887, intestate, and without having nominated tutors and curators to his children. He was survived by his wife and by five children, three of whom were in minority and two in pupillarity.

A petition was presented by Mrs Willison, with concurrence of her three minor children, to have herself appointed curator bonis to the three minor petitioners, and factor loco tutoris to the two pupil children.

The petitioners averred that the five children were entitled to succeed to certain shares of their father's estate, which consisted partly of heritage and partly of moveables. As their interests were alike it was expedient that the curator bonis appointed to the minors should also undertake the office of factor loco tutoris to the pupils.

After the petition was presented, Mrs Willison lodged a minute in which she stated that she did not desire the office of guardian to her children conferred upon her by the Act.

On 22d November 1890 the Lord Ordinary reported the motion for the appointment under the petition to the First Division.*

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think the difficulty suggested to the Lord Ordinary has arisen under section 2 of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, which provides

* "NOTE.—The petitioner, Mrs Willison, and her three minor daughters, concur in asking that Mrs Willison (who is a widow) should be appointed curator bonis to the three minor petitioners, and factor loco tutoris to her two younger daughters, who are in pupillarity.

"The petition does not refer to the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. cap. 27), but I called the attention of the petitioners to sections 2 and 8 of that statute, which seem to me to raise a serious obstacle to the appointment of Mrs Willison as factor loco tutoris to her pupil daughters. The statute, in very absolute terms, makes her their tutor, and I did not see how I could appoint her to be factor loco tutoris, which presupposes that there is no tutor. The petitioner, Mrs Willison, then lodged a minute, stating that she did not desire the office of guardian to her pupil children conferred upon her by the Act. It seems to me that this does not remove the difficulty, seeing that she is willing to act in the substantially identical capacity of factor loco tutoris. Had she absolutely declined to act as guardian in any form, it would, I think, have been competent, under section 13 of the Statute (taken in connection with section 12 of the same Act, and section 31 of the Pupils Protection Act), to appoint some other person as factor loco tutoris, and I have recently made such an appointment in another case, where the interest of the pupils seemed to require it. But I greatly doubt the competency of appointing a factor loco tutoris where there is, in form, no resignation of the office of tutor, and in reality no unwillingness to act.

"It was pressed upon me by counsel for the petitioner that there was great convenience in the course proposed, inasmuch as, if appointed factor loco tutoris, Mrs Willison would, under section 11 of the Judicial Factors (Scotland) Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. c. 39), become, ipso facto, curator bonis to the children when they attained minority, instead of having to present two applications to the Court for appointment in that capacity. I do not doubt that there would thereby be some saving of expense, but considerations of that kind will not justify the appointment if my view of the statute be correct. If, therefore, I had acted on my own judgment, I would have appointed Mrs Willison curator bonis to the minor children, and quoad ultra refused the prayer of the petition. But as the point is a new one, I have thought it best to report it. The peremptory character of a mother's appointment under the statute is dwelt on in the case of Maquay v. Campbell, June 27, 1888, 15 R. 784."

that "on the death of the father of an infant, and in case the father shall have died prior to the passing of this Act, then from and after the passing of this Act, the mother, if surviving, shall be the guardian of such infant, either alone, where no guardian has been appointed by the father, or jointly with any guardian appointed by the father; where no guardian has been appointed by the father, or if the guardian or guardians appointed by the father is or are dead, or refuses to act, the Court may, if it shall think fit, from time to time appoint a guardian or guardians to act jointly with the mother."

As regards the last part of the section, we have nothing to do with it here, because there is no application for the appointment of a guardian or guardians to act jointly with the mother. But the mother being in law guardian of these children, or tutor, as the Act is explained by the 8th section, she becomes such tutor or guardian by operation of the statute. She requires no service or appointment, but only the application of the Act itself. It may be that she is entitled to renounce her office. She may be placed in such circumstances as make it undesirable for the interest of her children that she should act as their guardian, but, until she renounces the office, no one can be appointed as factor loco tutoris. She is by statute law the guardian of her children.

There is a minute in process by which Mrs Willison states that she did not desire the office of guardian to her pupil children conferred upon her by the Act. Now, if by that she means to resign the office, and decline to act, it may be open to the Court to appoint a factor loco tutoris—that is to say, a factor in her place—but as to appointing the person who by law is entitled to be guardian to the office of factor loco tutoris—that is to say, to the office of factor coming in place of guardian—the law cannot do it. The office of guardian or tutor is hers absolutely. If she desires to act, let her act; if she desires to renounce the office, let her apply to someone else to act as factor loco tutoris. There is no other alternative open.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having considered the petition on the report of Lord Stormonth Darling, and heard counsel for the petitioner, remit to his Lordship to refuse the petition in so far as it prays for the appointment of Mrs Willison as factor loco tutoris to her pupil children: Quoad ultra remit to his Lordship to proceed."

HARRY M'CONDACH senior died in 1859, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement by which he conveyed his whole estate, heritable and moveable, to trustees for certain purposes. After providing for certain legacies, the testator directed the trustees to divide the residue into three equal parts. With regard to one of these parts he appointed the trustees to invest it in their names, "and the interest that may arise upon the said third part of said residue I hereby appoint from time to time, as the same shall fall due, to be paid by my said trustees to my daughter, Mrs Isobel M'Condach or Forbes, during her life, for her aliment and support, but that only in such portions at one time as my said trustees shall see proper; declaring further, that if my said trustees shall think that my said daughter's circumstances so require, but only if they shall see proper, it shall be in the power of my said trustees to make advances to my said daughter out of the principal itself of said third part of said residue for her further aliment and support, to an extent not exceeding £5 in any one year, nor £50 in whole." The settlement then provided,—"Upon the death of the said Mrs Isobel M'Condach or Forbes, I appoint the said third part of said residue so to be invested in the names of my said trustees, or the balance thereof, to be uplifted and equally divided, at the time after specified, among the children of her, the said Mrs Isobel M'Condach or Forbes, born or to be born of her present or any future marriage, equally between them, share and share alike; declaring that the said share falling to each of my said daughter's children shall so be payable by my said trustees or their aforesaids, to each of the said children as they respectively attain majority; . . . declaring that if all my said daughter's said children shall have attained majority before my said daughter's death, then that the said principal of said third part, or the balance thereof, shall be uplifted and divided among the said children as aforesaid as soon after my said daughter's death as my trustees or their aforesaids can conveniently uplift and divide the same; . . . declaring further that if any of my daughter's said children shall die before receiving payment of his or her share respectively, leaving lawful children, then that such children, equally between them, shall be entitled to their deceased parent's share; but declaring that if any of my said daughter's children shall die before receiving his or her share, leaving no lawful children, then that the share of such child or children so dying shall be equally divisible among such child or children's surviving brothers and sisters, and the lawful children as aforesaid of any of them that may have predeceased leaving lawful children, but in room only per stirpem of their deceased parents."

The children of Mrs Forbes had all reached majority before June 1890.

In June 1890, John Forbes and others, the whole children of Mrs Forbes, with consent and concurrence of Mrs Forbes, raised against M'Condach's trustees, in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen, an action for declarator that they had full and absolute right and title to the sum of £148, 6s. 8d., being the balance of one-third of the residue, and for decree for payment thereof.

The pursuers stated that they had acquired a vested right to the fee, that their mother, the liferentrix, was aged and in ill-health, that the income of the fund was insufficient for her maintenance, that they had been contributing to her maintenance, and that she was anxious to accelerate the period of division, and for that purpose had discharged her liferent.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The fee of the sum sued for having vested in the pursuers, and their mother having renounced and discharged her right of liferent in the same, the defenders are bound to denude themselves of the trust, and to make payment as prayed for, with costs.

The trustees defended the action, and pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The right to the said share of said residue liferented by the said Mrs Forbes as aforesaid does not vest under the said settlement till the date of her death.

They also contended that the liferent was alimentary, and could not be renounced.

The Sheriff-substitute (Grierson), on 24th July 1890, sustained the defenders' first plea in law, and assoilzied them.

The pursuers appealed to the Court of Session.

Argued for the pursuers;—The pursuers had a vested right in the trust-funds, the payment only being postponed. The only object of the postponement was the liferent. All the declarations of the deed simply followed out the legal rules of succession. At all events, the fund had vested in the pursuers as a class.[1]

Argued for the defenders;—There was no vesting till the death of Mrs Forbes, because the only right of the pursuers was to an equal division of the trust funds upon the death of their mother. No right was bestowed on them unless they survived that period, and there was a conditional institution of the children and survivors. It followed that the right was not vested while she lived.[2]

At advising,—

Lord Trayner.—The pursuers have brought this action to secure payment from the defenders of the sum remaining in their hands as the balance of the one-third of the residue of his estate which the late Mr M'Condach by his trust-settlement destined to his daughter Mrs Forbes, the pursuers' mother. By that settlement Mr M'Condach directed his trustees to invest in their own names one-third of the residue of his estate, and to pay the interest or produce thereof to Mrs Forbes "during her life, for her aliment and support," and "upon the death" of Mrs Forbes he directed the residue so invested to be uplifted and equally divided among her children, the children's shares being payable to them "as they respectively attain majority." There is also a provision to the effect that the issue of any child predeceasing "before receiving payment of his or her share" shall succeed to the parent's share, and that the share of a child predeceasing without issue shall be divided among that child's surviving brothers and sisters. The pursuers have all attained majority, and they contend that they are entitled to payment of the sum now in the defenders' hands, as their mother, whose liferent interest alone prevents the division of the fund, is willing to renounce her liferent; and Mrs Forbes is a party to this action and concurs in the pursuers' demand.

The trustees object to pay over the trust funds in their hands to the pursuers on two grounds,—(first) that they are not entitled to part with them, because the liferent is alimentary and cannot be renounced; and (secondly) because no right to the liferented fund has vested in the pursuers. I had much sympathy with the pursuers' case on reading the record and the settlement. But I have come to the conclusion that the pursuers are not entitled to the decree which they seek. I do not propose to deal with the first contention of the trustees—that the liferent is alimentary and cannot be renounced. But I think that on a sound construction of the testator's settlement no right vests in the pursuers till the death of Mrs Forbes. That appears to me to follow conclusively from the application of the decision pronounced in the case of Bryson's Trustees v. Clark, 8 R. 142. No right is by Mr M'Condach's settlement conferred upon the pursuers until the happening of a certain event, viz., the death of Mrs Forbes, their mother. Now, from the opinion of the Lord President in that case, it is clear that when no gift is conferred in favour of a person except upon the occurrence of a certain event, and not sooner, then no right vests in that person until that event happens. Till it does happen, the condition on which alone he is to take a right is not fulfilled. If no right has vested in the pursuers, the trustees cannot safely part with the trust funds to them, because having no vested right they cannot give the defenders a valid or effectual discharge.

On this ground, I am, although with some regret, of opinion that the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute ought to be affirmed.

WILLIAM SCOTT, commission-agent, Lauder, raised an action in the Small-Debt Court of Berwickshire against Mrs Lilias Wilson, residing in Lauder, setting forth that the defender was owing to the pursuer £12 as per note of claim.

Dec. 12, 1890.
Wilson v. Scott.

On 28th June 1890 Messrs Romanes & Rankin, the defender's agents, wrote to Mr John Mackenzie, the pursuer's agent,—"Pray say if, on payment of the sum demanded, Mrs Wilson's right to resume possession of the premises will be conceded without any question, and if the year's rent will be discharged. £12 was the rent for the year, and not the half year, as set forth in the summons."

On 30th June Mr Mackenzie wrote in reply,—"Dear Sirs,—I am in receipt of your letter of 28th inst., and regret that I cannot enter into any stipulations under which your client, Mrs Wilson, should pay the sum found due, and constituted by a decree of Court. Any question relative to possession is an entirely different matter, and cannot be mixed up in any way with the payment of the sum due under the decree. I admit that the rent of £12 is for one year, and not for half a year, and had I noticed it in time, would have amended the summons. It may, however, be done yet. I shall delay extracting the decree until Wednesday, in order to give you time to remit."

After further correspondence an arrestment and a poinding were executed upon the decree.

Mrs Wilson thereupon brought the present note of suspension and interdict praying for suspension of the decree, recall of arrestments, and for interdict against the sale of the poinded goods.

The complainer founded on the letter of 30th June above quoted, and pleaded;—(1) The decree being for £12, while the half year's rent has, since the decree has been pronounced, been admitted by the respondent to be £6 only, ought to be suspended with expenses, and the arrestment thereunder ought to be recalled, and the sale of the complainer's effects interdicted.

The respondent objected to the competency of the suspension on the ground that it was excluded by sec. 30 of the Small-Debt Act, 1 Vict. cap. 41.

It was not disputed that the year's rent of £12 was due, being payable in advance.

The Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Lee), on 4th September 1890, passed the note.

The respondent reclaimed.[1]

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a process of suspension and interdict, in which the complainer asks the Court to suspend a decree pronounced by the Sheriff of Roxburgh, Berwick, and Selkirk, and the whole grounds and warrant thereof, to recall certain arrestments, and to interdict a sale of the complainer's effects, which have been poinded in execution of that decree.

Now, the answer made to this note is, that the process is incompetent, because the decree which is sought to be suspended is a decree pronounced in the Small-Debt Court in terms of the Small-Debt Act (1 Vict. c. 41), and that the jurisdiction of this Court is excluded. An attempt was made to distinguish between the suspension of the decree itself and the diligence following upon it, but it will be seen at once by reference to the Small-Debt Act that there is no room for such a distinction, because the 30th section provides that "no decree given by any Sheriff in any cause or prosecution decided under the authority of this Act shall be subject to reduction, advocation, suspension, or appeal, or any other form of review, or stay of execution, other than that provided by this Act"—that is to say, by the immediately following section (sec. 31), which provides for an appeal to the Court of Justiciary on certain specified grounds.

The construction of these sections of the statute has been made the subject of several judgments of this Court, the first of which is the case of Graham v. Mackay, 7 D. 515. That was a very strong case for sustaining the jurisdiction of this Court, for there the complaint was that the Sheriff had no jurisdiction over the defender, and could not pronounce a decree against him. If any ground could have been found as an exception to the general rule laid down by the statute, that would most readily have suggested itself, because if there is no jurisdiction to pronounce a decree, then there is no decree. The Court, however, disregarded that consideration, and held that everything which calls itself and bears to be a small-debt decree must receive effect unless set aside in the manner prescribed by the 31st section of the Act.

The respondent here got a decree for £12, but it is said that by mistake the £12 was described as rent for half a year, whereas it was a full year's rent. I am quite willing, if necessary, to assume that the complainer—the defender in the Small-Debt Court—did not owe the respondent any money at all, but even then I think we cannot get the better of the 30th section of the Act, because this is in form a small-debt decree, and therefore we must give effect to the plain language of the 30th section.

It is quite true that subsequent to the case of Graham v. Mackay certain learned Judges in the Outer-House have departed from the rule so plainly laid down there, misled, I think, by a phantom light which calls itself "substantial justice." But these departures have been corrected by appeal to the Inner-House. "Substantial justice" in the abstract may be the maximum bonum, and in the smooth current of the administration of justice, where nothing intervenes to prevent it, there is no reason why "substantial justice" should not always be done. But there are many inconveniences and considerations of public policy that sometimes intervene, and are recognised by the Legislature as good grounds for refusing effect to the plea of "substantial justice" in any particular class of cases and a Court of law is bound to subordinate the wisdom of the philosopher and the scientific jurist to the wisdom of the Legislature. We have occasion sometimes to lament that the wisdom of the Legislature is expressed in terms somewhat approaching to the ambiguity of the Delphic Oracle, but if the Legislature speaks distinctly and without ambiguity, then it is the sole guide for a Court of law. So, in the present case, I apprehend that "substantial justice" coming into conflict with a precise and unambiguous enactment is naught, and must go to the wall. The wisdom of the Legislature must prevail over everything.

This doctrine, and the particular rule established in the case of Graham v. Mackay, have been repeated in several later cases, which it is unnecessary for me to go over, but they repeat in almost so many words the rule laid down in the case of Graham v. Mackay.

It is necessary, perhaps, to add, in conclusion, that there may be facts emerging subsequent to the date of the decree which will prevent the holder of the decree putting it in force. If the defender can shew that his debt has since been paid entitled to custody, but that only leads up to the true object of the petitio the prayer is not meant to be a substantive prayer, for the fact is that th was forcibly carried away from the petitioner on 12th November last, an to remedy this wrong that the petition is brought, and for no other p The leading prayer therefore is that the mother, or anyone else who sho found to be withholding the child from the custody of its father, sho ordained to deliver up the child to the petitioner. That is the true na the petition, and I agree with your Lordship that, that object havin attained, we ought simply to dismiss the petition, and find the petitioner e to expenses.

Lord M'Laren.—It is true that under the Guardianship of Infants A provided that, upon the application of the mother, the Court is to mak order as may be fitting regarding the custody of the child and right of ac it. I agree with your Lordship in the view that this does not necessaril our jurisdiction to cases where the petition is in the name of the mothe the contrary, wherever there is a process depending which truly raises th tion of the regulation of the rights of the spouses with reference to the cu custody of the children, an order such as the statute contemplates may be and that may be, as in the case of Beedie, in a petition at the instance father for access, or it may be in disposing of an application for separatio aliment. But the present case does not raise any question of the regula the rights of the spouses; it is an application for the purpose of restori right of the husband against an attempt on the part of the wife to depri of it by taking the law into her own hands, and I think if we were to allo process to be converted into an application for access, we should be intro a new form of jurisdiction founded on arrestment.

Lord Kinnear concurred.

Counsel for the petitioner moved that the respondent be found in expenses. Counsel for the respondent stated that the responde no separate estate in the ordinary sense of the word. She was w to support herself, and it was not usual to give the husband ex against his wife in such circumstances. Counsel for the petitioner that his information was that she was earning a livelihood as a grapher.

Court for a peremptory order on the respondent to hand over the child to him. This motion was refused, and the case was sent to the Summar Roll, but the Court intimated to the respondent's counsel that the respondent would have to disclose the place of residence of the child.

Thereafter, the petitioner having failed to discover the residence of the child, and the respondent having refused to inform him, he presented a note to the Court seeking to have the respondent ordained to inform him of the child's residence, and the Court on 3d December, having considered the note and heard counsel for the respondent, ordained the respondent to give such information within twenty-four hours, with certification. This order was followed by the restoration of the child.

On the question of access it was argued for the respondent;—Under the 5th section of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, it was open to a father or a mother living apart from one another at any time to come to the Court and ask for an order for the custody of or access to their children. The respondent was entitled to have such an order pronounced under the present petition.[1]

Argued for the petitioner;—This was not an ordinary petition for custody. The object of the petition really was the undoing of an illegal act by the respondent, and that object had now been accomplished, as the father had obtained restoration of his child. The petition then fell to be dismissed, and it was incompetent to consider the question of access, which was not raised in the petition. The petitioner had had no opportunity of considering the averments of the respondent, assuming them to be relevant.

Lord President.—The sole object of this petition was to obtain delivery to the father of a child which had been illegally carried away by its mother. That end has been attained, and the object of the petition having thus been accomplished, I think the proceeding is at an end. We cannot do anything more in terms of the prayer of the petition except find that it is unnecessary to grant further order, because the petitioner has obtained delivery of his child. After the question of expenses has been disposed of there is nothing more before us.

It is sometimes convenient, especially with a view to save expenses, to regulate the matter of possession, custody, or access in a process where the question does not necessarily arise, but that is a different kind of case from the present, because the whole object is to undo an illegal act, and when the illegal act is undone I do not think we can raise up another question.

It would not save expense if we were to consider the right of the mother to access, because we must have more information before we can dispose of the question. The petitioner has had no opportunity of meeting the averments contained in the answers, and must have such an opportunity before we can dispose of the question.

I therefore think we ought simply to find it unnecessary to pronounce any further order, and dismiss the petition.

Lord Adam.—If this were a proper petition for custody of a child, in the case of determining which of the spouses had right to the child, it might make a difference in the result to be arrived at. That, however, is not the nature of the petition. It is true the petition contains a prayer to find the petitioner

(SEE ante, July 15, 1890, 17 R. 1130.)

In an action of damages raised by William Hastings and others, formerly seamen on board the s.s. "Tay," against, inter alios, Robert Chalmers, inspector of police of Linlithgowshire, for illegal apprehension on 4th June 1889, the pursuer moved for a diligence to recover the reports made by Chalmers to the Procurator-fiscal of the county of Linlithgow, relating to the circumstances of the arrest, in order that they should be used in evidence before the jury which had been summoned to try the action.

The pursuer founded upon the undernoted authorities.[1]

The motion was not opposed by the defender.

On behalf of the Lord Advocate, it was stated that while he was unable to declare that any prejudice would arise to the public service from the disclosure of the information, he was of opinion that it was highly inexpedient that such confidential reports should be produced.

THE COURT (LORD PRESIDENT, LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR) refused the motion, on the ground that the reports sought to be recovered were confidential communications by an officer in the public service to his superior officer in the same department.

Succession—Deathbed—Cash payment—34 and 35 Vict. c. 81.—The Act 34 and 35 Vict. c. 81, upon the preamble that "it is expedient to abolish all challenges and reductions in Scotland ex capite lecti," provides "that no deed, instrument, or writing made by any person who shall die after the passing of this Act, shall be liable to challenge or reduction ex capite lecti."

A father executed a deed of provision "to come into operation during my lifetime," whereby he conveyed to trustees for behoof of three of his children nominatim, "the sum of £6000 (£3200 of which I have handed to them in cash.) . . ." The deed was delivered immediately after its execution, and the £3200 was at the same time handed by the granter to the trustees by cheque payable to one of them. A child of the granter of the deed, who had not been mentioned in it, sought to have it declared that she was entitled to legitim out of the £3200 handed over in cash, averring that the sum had been handed to the trustees by her father on deathbed. Held that the pursuer's averment was irrelevant, in respect the payment of the money was to be regarded as made in implement of the deed of provision, and not as an independent transaction.

Hay v. Coutts' Trustees.

1ST DIVISION.

Ld. Kyllachy. C.

On 28th April 1884 James Coutts, residing at Corstorphine House, Corstorphine, executed a trust-deed of provision "to come into operation during my lifetime," whereby he conveyed to trustees for behoof of three of his youngest children, viz., Mary, Malcolm, and Alice Coutts, "the sum of £6000 sterling (£3200 sterling of which I have handed to them in cash, and the remainder being contained in five several bonds and dispositions in security, which I have assigned to them by separate assignations of the said bonds and dispositions in security executed by me of even date herewith)."

The deed was delivered immediately after its execution, and the funds thereby settled were paid over to the trustees at the time, £2800 in heritable bonds and £3200 being handed over to the trustees by Mr Coutts, by cheque upon the Royal Bank of Scotland payable to one of the trustees.

Mr Coutts died on 2d June 1884. His wife survived him, and died on 10th December 1888. He left a trust-disposition and settlement in favour of the same trustees, dated 29th April 1884, in which he disposed of the universitas of his estate as at his death amongst his ten children. His moveable estate at the date of his death amounted, exclusive of the sum of £3200, to £10,000 or thereby.

Mrs Jane Amelia Coutts or Hay, his eldest child, brought an action against the trustees under the two deeds, seeking to have it declared "that the pursuer is entitled to one-tenth of one-half of the moveable estate left by the said deceased James Coutts, her father, in name of legitim: And further, that the sum of £3200 mentioned in the said trust-deed of provision was paid and transferred to the defenders, as trustees therein mentioned, by the deceased James Coutts, without any just, necessary, or onerous cause, on or about the 28th day of April 1884, while he was on deathbed, within sixty days of his death, and while labouring under the disease of which he died, to the prejudice of the pursuer as a child of the deceased James Coutts, as aforesaid: And further, that the pursuer is entitled to one-tenth of one-half of said sum of £3200 as part of her legitim payable therefrom."

The summons contained further conclusions for count, reckoning, and payment.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The said James Coutts having paid the said sum of £3200 to the defenders while he was on deathbed, and within sixty days of his death, and while labouring under the disease of which he died, the pursuer is entitled to decree of declarator, count, reckoning, and payment, as craved.

The defenders pleaded;—(5) Said deed is not subject to challenge on the head of deathbed, in respect that the exception of deathbed was abolished by the Statute 34 and 35 Victoria, cap. 81.

On 6th November 1890 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) found that the pursuer had made no relevant averment in support of her second plea in law, and therefore repelled the said plea.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The Act 34 and 35 Vict. c. 81, only abolished the law of deathbed as to "deeds, instruments, or writings."[1] The only case contemplated by it was that of dispositions of heritage executed on deathbed. The old law otherwise remained in force which

Dec. 16, 1890. Hay v. Coutts' Trustees.

Argued for the defenders;—(1) The deed in question was not open to challenge as defeating the children's legitim, for it was an irrevocable inter vivos deed completely divesting him of the sums thereby conveyed. (2) The delivery of the cash and the execution of the deed fall to be regarded as one transaction, and as the deed could not be challenged ex capite lecti under the Act, neither could the transference of the money, which was made in pursuance of the deed. Further, it was a reasonable view that when the Act abolished challenges of "deeds" ex capite lecti, the Legislature also intended to extend its operation to delivery of cash on deathbed.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The trust-deed of provision executed by James Coutts is dated 28th April 1884 and he died on 2d June thereafter. It is impossible to view the deed as a disposition mortis causa, because it is not a deed under which any right could revive to the maker in the event of his recovering from the disease under which he was suffering. It was an out and out settlement in favour of three of his children, "to come into operation during my lifetime," and it conveyed to the trustees acting under it the sum of £6000 in all, to be managed and disposed of by them for the benefit of the three children. The £6000 consisted partly of heritable bonds, and the pursuer does not seek to challenge the deed so far as these bonds are concerned, because her only title to challenge the deed arises from her right to legitim, which is pleaded on record, and heritable bonds are not subject to claims for legitim. It is therefore the sum of £3200, which the truster says in the deed "I have handed to them" (the trustees) "in cash," which forms the subject of contention between the parties. The plea which the Lord Ordinary repelled is,—"The said James Coutts having paid the said sum of £3200 to the defenders while he was on his deathbed, and within sixty days of his death, and while labouring under the disease of which he died, the pursuer is entitled to decree of declarator, reckoning, and payment as craved." The Lord Ordinary held that the pursuer had made no relevant averment to support the plea, and I agree with him. I think the question comes to be whether the deed is open to challenge as a whole. If £3200 had been handed over in bank-notes by the testator on deathbed without anything more being done, it would be a different case, and would have looked like a fraud on the legitim. That, however, is not the case. The sum is handed over by cheque in pursuance of a general settlement in favour of three particular children referred to in the deed, and the transaction must stand or fall as a whole.

I cannot say I can find any law for holding that after the passing of the Act 34 and 35 Vict. c. 81, a deed of this kind is reducible on the ground of deathbed. On the contrary, it appears to me that the effect of the statute is to protect from challenge on such a ground every deed or writing by a testator. I am therefore of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor ought to be adhered to.

LORD ADAM.—I am of exactly the same opinion. The object of the pursuer in seeking to separate the transaction into two parts is obvious, because if she could plead the actual payment over in cash of the sum of £3200 as a distinct and separate transaction by itself, she might have a good deal to say for the plea that the transaction did not fall within the statute which abolished the exception of deathbed. It might be argued that the enacting clause of the statute applies to instruments and writings only, and that the actual handing over of cash cannot be brought under the clause. The question would have thus been left open as to whether the Act was meant to apply to a case like this.

But I agree with your Lordship that we must look at the trust-disposition and the payment of the money to the trustees as one transaction. If that is truly the nature of the transaction, then, beyond all question, we have what constitutes a title to the beneficiaries, and, being a deed, writing, and instrument, it falls within the enacting clause of the Act.

LORD M'LAREN.—The legal question which was argued by Mr Miller is no doubt an interesting point, if the circumstances of the case admitted of such a question being raised, because, whether by design or by inadvertence, it is certain that the Statute of 34 and 35 Vict. does not in its enacting words contemplate the case of a gift made without writing, and reducible on the head of deathbed. Should such a case arise for consideration, we shall have to consider whether the enacting words can receive aid from the preamble, or whether they must be taken as they stand. No such case is raised here, because under the deed of settlement, produced and printed, the trustees of Mr Coutts have received by deed of gift, assignation, and disposition the sum of £6000 sterling, whereof, it is stated, the testator handed to them £3200 in cash. That deed of gift is a good title to the money, and may be pleaded in answer to a demand upon the trustees to account. Under the old law the effect of the deed might be taken away by reduction ex capite lecti. But here the statute comes in to fortify the title by taking away the right of challenge ex capite lecti, and therefore the case of the pursuer under the second plea in law entirely fails.

CHARLES MANN, Defender (Respondent).—D.-F. Balfour—Sym.

Process—Jury trial—Verdict—Contributory negligence—Reparation.—In an action of damages for personal injury, the jury returned the following verdict,—"Find for the pursuer, but in respect of there being contributory negligence on the part of the pursuer, assess the damages at £300." Held that the verdict being either self-contradictory or ambiguous, could not be applied as a verdict for either party, and that it must therefore be set aside and a new trial granted.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Kyllachy.
C.

CHARLES A. B. FLORENCE raised an action against Charles Mann, proprietor of the Palace Hotel, Aberdeen, for £2000, as damages, in respect of personal injuries sustained by him in a fall from the second floor of the defender's hotel into the space in which the lift worked.

The case was tried before Lord Kyllachy on 16th and 17th October, on the ordinary issue of fault, and the jury returned the following verdict:—"Find for the pursuer, but in respect of there being contributory negligence on the part of the pursuer, assess the damages at £300."

The defender moved the presiding Judge to hold the verdict as one for him. The pursuer requested his Lordship to charge the jury anew. Lord Kyllachy directed the verdict to be entered as delivered.

Both parties moved in the Inner-House to have the verdict set aside and a new trial granted, in the event of this verdict not being entered in their favour by the Lord Ordinary.

Thereafter, both parties having claimed the verdict, the Lord Ord on 13th November, pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lord Ord having considered the motion of the pursuer to apply the verdic decern for the damages found due, and the counter motion of the def to enter the verdict as a verdict for the defender, and to apply the by granting decree of absolvitor, in respect it is stated that both p have applied to the First Division of the Court to set aside the v and grant a new trial, reports the said motions to the First Divis the Court." *

Argued for the pursuer;—The fair reading of the verdict was t was an unequivocal finding for the pursuer. The qualification intro by the word "but," was inserted by the jury merely in order to in their reason for mitigating the damages, and it was a part of the f quite separable from the earlier portion. The verdict was entirely dif from the verdict given in the case of M'Naughton v. Caledonian Ra Co.[1] founded upon by the defender. "Nor would the result be different if the Lord Ordinary were to apply construction of the verdict his knowledge of the evidence. No view facts occurs to him upon which the jury could legitimately have found the pursuer on the question of contributory negligence, and at the same given him a verdict. It is not, the Lord Ordinary thinks, possible to rej the finding as amounting merely to this, that the pursuer might by extraor caution have avoided the accident. Negligence implies want of ordinary ca and this the jury quite understood. Neither was the case one in which was any suggestion that the accident, being due to the sole fault of the def the injury was aggravated by some fault of the pursuer. defenders. "Contributory negligence" in the sense of the present verdict was negligence which the jury thought not to be proximate to the result, but remote, and which was to be considered by them as affecting the damages. There might be negligence on the pursuer's part, and yet it might not be sufficiently proximate to the accident to disentitle him to a verdict.[1]

Argued for the defender;—The verdict was equivalent to a finding that the accident was produced by two causes—fault on the part of the defender and fault on the part of the pursuer. The pursuer could not recover on such a verdict, for according to it the accident would not have happened but for his own fault.[2] The jury had in fact negatived the issue sent for trial,—whether the accident was due to the defender's fault,—by finding that it was in part due to the pursuer's own fault. Had there been, as in the older practice, a separate issue of contributory negligence, it was clear that the jury would have affirmed it. It was impossible to separate the verdict into (1) a verdict for the pursuer, and (2) a qualification as a reason for mitigating damages. It was not legitimate to use contributory negligence merely to reduce the damages, and in any view, that was not the fair reading of the verdict. It was exactly to the same effect as the verdict in M'Naughton's case, which was entered up for the defenders. The English cases[3] referred to, as to "proximate" fault or "decisive" cause, were not unfavourable to the defender. They really only came to this, that the person who last had the opportunity of avoiding the accident, notwithstanding the other's negligence, was responsible. If that applied here, it was fatal to the pursuer, for according to his own case he had opened the door communicating with the lift and entered a dark place, and the jury had found that to be a negligent act.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This verdict is expressed thus:—"Find for the pursuer, but in respect of there being contributory negligence on the part of the pursuer, assess the damages at £300."

Now, of course, a great deal depends in construing this verdict upon what the jury meant by the words "contributory negligence," but I think we must take it for granted that the jury were well instructed as to the meaning of these words. There is no complaint as to the way in which the case was left in the hands of the jury by the presiding Judge. There being evidence apparently to go to the jury on the question of contributory negligence, it must be assumed that his Lordship explained what the words meant in law.

Now, I think the matter is very well settled in our law, and I do not know any better exposition of the doctrine of contributory negligence than that given by Lord Wood in the case of M'Naughton v. Caledonian Railway Co.[2] "The fault must be such as to have directly conduced to the injury suffered, and not merely remotely connected with it, for in that case it is not to be considered as contributory to the injury, within the principle that fault or negligence on the part of the individual injured shall afford a good answer to a claim by him for damages against a defender who has also been guilty of fault or negligence. The fault of the injured party, when only remotely connected with the accident, is to be, as it were, discounted from the case. In a legal view, it, in the question of the abstract right to damages, forms no part of the case—the negligence of the defender alone being held to have caused the injury—whatever weight it may be entitled to in assessing the amount of the damages. But on the other hand, if while there was fault on the part of the defender, directly conducing to or causing the injury, there was, at the same time, fault on the part of the individual injured, by rashness or want of the care which he was bound to exercise, or in any other way which also directly contributed to the injury, then damages cannot be recovered by him."

Now, taking the words contributory negligence in the sense there expressed, what is it that this verdict means? I think this, that the jury found for the pursuer, but in respect of there being contributory negligence on his part, they reduced the damages to £300. If that is the meaning of the verdict it is plainly bad in law, because they were not entitled after finding contributory negligence to bring in a verdict for the pursuer, and just as little were they entitled, having found fault on both sides, to reduce the damages merely in respect of contributory negligence. In short, the verdict is quite unsound in point of law. If the meaning is anything else, I am quite unable to say what it does mean. And the conclusion I therefore arrive at is, either that the verdict means something quite inconsistent with the law applicable to the case, or it has no intelligible meaning at all, or, in other words, is tainted by a fatal ambiguity, and the result must be that it must be entered for neither party.

No doubt a slight variance in the form of the verdict might have made a great difference, and might have entitled the defender to claim the verdict as one for him. Suppose the jury had said they found that the pursuer was injured by the fault of the defender, and that the injury was caused also by the contributory negligence of the pursuer, and assessed the damages at £300. That would have been quite an intelligible verdict. It would have been a verdict which is commonly called a special verdict. It would have found two matters of fact, and would have assessed the damages contingent on the verdict being entered up for the pursuer, but would have left it to the Court to decide whether it should be entered up as one for the pursuer or as one for the defender. We should have had a substantive finding (first) that the defender was in fault; (second) that the pursuer was in fault; and that both faults contributed to produce the injury. The law applicable to this is not doubtful. The pursuer could not recover damages on such a verdict. But see how different this is from the present verdict. The jury do not assess the damages contingent upon the verdict being entered up for the pursuer, but they assess them at what they conceive a low rate, because the pursuer's fault contributed to the injury. Now, the legal consequence of the pursuer contributing to the injury is to find no damages due to him. I am therefore for setting aside the verdict altogether, and directing a new trial. I think the jury could not have understood the nature and effect of contributory negligence, though they received perfectly good instruction from the presiding Judge on the point.

LORD ADAM.—I also think this verdict contradictory and ambiguous.

No. 57.

Dec. 17, 1890.
Florence v. Mann.

The first part of it, by which there is a finding for the pursuer, to my mind firms the question put in the issue, that the injuries caused to the pursuer were used by the fault of the defender, and, if there was no more in the verdict, here would be no question before us.

The verdict, however, goes on to state that, "in respect of there being contributory negligence on the part of the pursuer, we assess the damages at £300." Now, Mr Comrie Thomson argued that all the jury meant by this finding was t they thought there had been some negligence on the part of the pursuer, t that it was not such negligence as went to the essence of the case, but was ly considered by the jury in diminishing the damage. The example was taken n the case of Davies v. Mann of a drunk man being found lying in an avenue, l having been run over in the dark. If the jury found in such a case that the ured man had not contributed to the accident, it might nevertheless be said t the jury might fairly take into consideration the fact of the man's being e in the dark, and might assume that as a reason for diminishing the damages. rtainly should not say that that was an erroneous view to take of such a case. ly difficulty here, however, lies in the existence of the word "contributory." nnot but believe that the jury meant what we understand by the word. No ction was taken to the Judge's charge, and we must assume that he explained hen the meaning of the word, and told them that it was such negligence on part of the pursuer as contributed to or caused the accident; and, if that is I agree with your Lordship in thinking that the result in the finding is not to minish the damages, but to lead to the finding of no damages being due at all.

I therefore think that the verdict is self-contradictory and ambiguous, and it does not appear to me that the jury understood what they were saying when they announced the view which they did in order to diminish the damages. This is not the case of a special finding that there was fault on the part of the defender, and also upon the part of the pursuer, where it is left to the Court to enter up the verdict for one or other party. We have instead a definite finding for the pursuer, and, in the awarding of the damages to him, a finding which is inconsistent with it. I think, then, the verdict must be set aside, and a new trial ordered.

Lord M'Laren.—It seems to me that the argument on the construction of this verdict resolves into a logical dilemma, which is the result of the jury having found the pursuer guilty of "contributory negligence." Either these words were used in their ordinary and legal signification, or they were used in some different sense, which the jury has failed to explain.

In the first alternative, the verdict is void as being contrary to law; in the second alternative, it is void for uncertainty or ambiguity. I need say no more, except to express my concurrence in the reasons given by your Lordship for setting aside this verdict.

Lord Kinnear concurred with the Lord President.

The Court pronounced this interlocutor:—"On the report of Lord Kyllachy, having heard counsel for both parties, set aside the verdict found by the jury upon the issue in this case as self-contradictory or ambiguous: Appoint a new trial to be had in the cause, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed accordingly."

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Stormonth Darling. C.

THE DUKE OF SUTHERLAND raised an action against William Reed others, crofters, Crakaig, parish of Loth, Sutherlandshire, in whic sought to have it declared that they had "no right or title to enter or pasture their cattle, horses, sheep, or other bestial, upon the farm lands of Crakaig belonging to the pursuer, and let to John Bra Dudgeon, farmer, Crakaig, his tenant, or upon any part thereof." summons further concluded for interdict against the defenders ent upon the lands or disturbing the tenant in his possession of the "and in particular from grazing their sheep or bestial to the west o line marked A B on the plan produced herewith, being the ea boundary of said farm of Crakaig."

The pursuer averred that the eastern boundary, as expressed i leases of Dudgeon and his predecessor, consisted partly of a dyke en ing it from the grazing possessed in common by the defenders and crofters whose holdings were to the east of the farm and of a line in tinuation of this dyke running northward to the top of the hill.

The defence to the action was two-fold. In the first place, the d ders maintained that the eastern boundary of Crakaig farm was no dyke at A B on the plan but was the burn of Crakaig, which was 100 yards to the west of the dyke, and that therefore they were w their right in pasturing as far as the burn of Crakaig. They averred this matter had been determined adversely to the pursuer in their fa in an action raised by him against them in the Sheriff Court of Ross Cromarty on 10th July 1889.

In the action referred to the Duke prayed the Sheriff to interdic defenders from unlawfully entering, trespassing, and pasturing their c horses, sheep, or other bestial, upon the farm and lands of Crakaig, i parish of Loth and county of Sutherland, or upon any part thereof, to remove such cattle, &c., as they had already put on the lands."

No. 58.

Dec. 18, 1890. Duke of Sutherland v. Reed.

The defenders averred that the crofts of which they were tenants were formerly held by them or their authors as subtenants of the tenant of the farm of Crakaig. (Stat. 2) "About forty years ago it was intimated to the whole crofters in said township that they should hold direct from the landlord. At that time the landlord's factor (Mr Gunn), along with the then tenant of the farm of Crakaig (Mr Innes), settled the exact boundary between the crofters' hill pasture and the farm of Crakaig. That boundary was announced to be the said burn of Crakaig on the west, and an old ditch and turf dyke leading eastwards from the said Crakaig burn to the road leading from the public road to the defenders' holding on the south."

They further averred, that from the time they took their respective holdings they had always put their stock on the hill pasture.

The pursuers answered, that the true boundary of the farm was not the burn of Crakaig but was the dyke marked A B upon the plan produced in the present action.

On 26th August 1889 the Sheriff-substitute (Mackenzie) allowed the defenders a "proof of article 2 of their statement of facts (in so far as the same is denied or not admitted), and the pursuers a conjunct probation." He then granted interim interdict and personally inspected the ground. After a proof in which both parties led evidence of possession, the Sheriff-substitute, on 10th December 1889, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the crofts of which the defenders are now in possession were formerly held by them or their authors as subtenants on the Crakaig farm, and that, attached to said crofts, there was a large extent of hill pasture common to the whole crofters of the township of Crakaig, and lying between the Alteenie burn on the east and the Crakaig burn on the west: Finds that during the tenancy of Robert Innes, principal tenant of Crakaig farm—and about forty years ago—intimation was made to the whole crofters of the township that in future they should hold direct of the proprietor, the Duke of Sutherland, to whom the rents would be payable, and this arrangement was then carried out and has been acted upon ever since: Finds that in carrying out said arrangement the proprietor's factor, Mr Gunn, along with the said Robert Innes, settled and defined the boundaries between the crofters' hill pasture and the Crakaig farm pasture as follows:—The Crakaig burn on the west, and an old drain and feal dyke leading eastwards from the Crakaig burn to the road giving access from the public road to the defenders' holdings on the south: Finds that the hill pasture between these boundaries has been possessed and used in common by the defenders and the other crofters of the township ever since said delimitation and up to July last, when the present interdict was served upon the defenders, and that until said last-mentioned date no legal intimation was ever made to them that in occupying the common pasture allocated as above mentioned they were thereby acting illegally and committing a trespass upon any part of the principal farm of Crakaig: Finds in law, that as crofters in legal and actual possession of the common pasture extending up to the Crakaig burn on the west at the date of the passing of the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act of 1886, the defenders are entitled to security of tenure as regards the holdings then possessed by them: Therefore finds that the present action, in so far as it seeks to interfere with their free use of the said common pasture extending up to the Crakaig burn (and no other trespass on the Crakaig farm is alleged against the defenders), is incompetent: Recalls the interim interdict, and dismisses the action."

The pursuer appealed to the Sheriff (Low) but did not insist in his appeal, which was dismissed on 16th January 1890.

In the second place the defenders averred that the present actio within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Crofters Commission, with they had on 28th May 1887 lodged an application to have fair rents for their holdings, including the disputed portion of the hill grazing that these applications were still pending. The whole subject-matt the present action fell within the jurisdiction of the Commission, an disputed boundaries or marches would be determined on the heari the applications. By section 21 of the Crofters Holdings (Scotland 1886, the Commission was empowered to determine summarily any tions relative to the boundaries or marches between crofters' hol including grazings and adjoining lands, and its decision in that n was declared by section 25 to be final.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The defenders having no right or ti enter upon, or pasture their cattle, horses, sheep, or other bestial upo said farm and lands of Crakaig, decree ought to be granted, in ter the conclusions of the summons.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) Res judicata. (2) Forum non conve (3) The pursuer having submitted the matter in controversy betwe parties to the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, and having with his appeal against the said judgment which determined the said c versy on its merits, and having acquiesced in its becoming final, is l from insisting in the present action. (4) The matter in controversy raised by the defenders' prior application to the Crofters Commi which is still pending, and the said Commission being empowe determine such questions finally, the present action should be missed.

On 13th November 1890, the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth Darlin pelled the 1st, 2d, 3d, and 4th pleas in law for the defenders, and al the parties a proof of their averments.*

"I do not think that either of these pleas is a bar to inquiry in the p action.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The defence of res judicata in respect of the Sheriff Court action fell to be sustained. Substantially the same question as arose here, viz., as to the exact boundaries of the farm of Crakaig, had been raised in that action between the present parties, and even although the form of the present action in the Court of Session was different, the plea of res judicata was good.[1] Looking to the procedure in the Sheriff Court action, it was vain to say that it was merely one to regulate possession. 2. Prior to the raising of the Sheriff Court action, the defenders had applied to the Crofters Commission to have fair rents fixed. That necessarily brought within the cognisance of the Commission all questions affecting the extent of their holdings. Indeed, by section 21 of the Crofters Holdings Act, 1886, they had power to decide any questions as to boundaries. The jurisdiction then of the Court of Session was ousted, and the matter fell within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Commission.

Argued for the pursuer;—No decree of a Sheriff in any action, whether possessory or otherwise, could ever be res judicata in a subsequent action raised in the Supreme Court. The text of Erskine[2] was to this effect, and although Mr Nicolson, in his edition, had cited in a footnote certain cases which he said seemed to point to an opposite conclusion, none of them bore out the statement.[3] There was further a substantial distinction between the two actions. The judgment in the Sheriff Court action was a possessory one upon a limited amount of proof. The question raised in the present action was one as to heritable right. 2. The jurisdiction of the Court of Session was not ousted. It might be that the Commissioners had power under the Act to fix the boundaries between crofters' holdings and adjoining lands, but the question could be equally well decided here. Indeed, this was the most convenient forum,[4] and a judgment in the may not have been, and probably was not, presented with the fulness appropriate to a declarator in the Supreme Court.

"(2) By section 21 of the Crofters Act it is made competent to the Commissioners to decide summarily any questions relating to the boundaries or marches between crofters' holdings and adjoining lands. This section is introduced, and I think the whole of it is controlled by the words 'when an application for an enlargement of crofters' holdings is made to the Crofters Commission,' but it is admitted by the pursuer that such an application has been made by the defenders, although it has not yet been considered by the Commissioners. The defenders' counsel rather repudiated the notion that it was by this application that the Commissioners' right of adjudication was let in, for he maintained that the application to fix a fair rent necessarily brought within their cognisance all questions affecting the extent of the holding. But whether the jurisdiction of the Commissioners is invoked by the one kind of application or the other, I am of opinion that it is not privative, and that in particular it does not oust the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in determining whether a particular area of ground falls within one contract of lease or another (see Erskine's Inst. 1, 2, 7, and with reference to a separate part of the jurisdiction of the Crofters Commission Fraser v. Macdonald, 14 R. 181)."

Duke of Sutherland v. Reed.

Supreme Court upon the point would shew the Commissioners, when came to consider the questions submitted to them, the exact state of rights of both parties at the date of the application to the Commissio

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an action of declarator in which it is sought declared that the defenders, who are crofters in the parish of Loth and county of Sutherland, have no right or title to enter upon or pasture their horses, sheep, or other bestial upon the farm and lands of Crakaig, in the of Loth and county of Sutherland, belonging to the pursuer, and let to Bradfute Dudgeon, farmer, Crakaig, his tenant, or upon any part thereo there follows a conclusion for interdict against the defenders entering up disturbing the tenant in his possession of the farm.

Now, the defence upon the merits to that action is that the defenders the right of pasturage over the lands in question, and there is thus raised a tion of fact and law which seems to be quite competent to be raised b summons and defences, and as certainly suited to the jurisdiction of this But the action has been met by four pleas in law of what may be ca technical character, but in practical effect they resolve into two only. Th is res judicata, and the other is forum non conveniens. The Lord Ordina disposed of these adversely to the defenders.

As regards the plea of res judicata, it is founded upon a summons or pe in the Sheriff Court of the county of Sutherland, and a judgment prono by the Sheriff-substitute thereon. The petition prays the Sheriff to int the defenders from unlawfully entering, trespassing, and pasturing their horses, sheep, or other bestial upon the farm and lands of Crakaig, i parish of Loth and county of Sutherland, or upon any part thereof, a forth. Now, this petition was disposed of by the Sheriff-substitute in which appears to me to be rather remarkable. The statements of the ties in that petition were to a large extent statements of possessio the one party and the other, but the way in which the Sheriff-subs dealt with the case was to allow a very limited proof, not a general of possession to both parties, but a proof of article 2 of the defenders' ment of facts (in so far as the same is denied or not admitted), and pursuer a conjunct probation. Now, statement 2 for the defenders in that S Court case was not a statement of possession at all, but it was to this eff "That about forty years ago it was intimated to the whole crofters in said ship that they should hold direct from the landlord. At that time the land factor (Mr Gunn) along with the then tenant of the farm of Crakaig (Mr settled the exact boundary between the crofters' hill pasture and the fa Crakaig. That boundary was announced to be the said burn of Crakaig o west, and an old ditch and turf dyke leading eastwards from the said C burn to the road leading from the public road to the defenders' holdings south." Now, that is an averment of an agreement, but when the parties to lead evidence the Sheriff-substitute seems to have forgotten what was the character of the proof he allowed, and accordingly evidence of possessio adduced upon both sides. The proceedings therefore were so far very irre But what renders the whole case still more remarkable is this, that in th the Sheriff-substitute "finds that the hill pasture between the said sou boundary and the defenders' holdings has been possessed and used in co by the defenders and the other crofters of the township ever since said d

tation and up to July last, when the present interdict was served upon the defenders." Now, that is a finding in fact on which the Sheriff-substitute had allowed no proof whatever. Then he finds still further, "that until said last mentioned date no legal intimation was ever made to them that in occupying the common pasture allocated as above mentioned they were acting illegally and committing a trespass upon any part of the principal farm of Crakaig." And he "finds in law that as crofters in legal and actual possession of the common pasture up to the Crakaig burn on the west at the date of the passing of the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act of 1886, the defenders are entitled to security of tenure as regards the holdings then possessed by them"; and therefore he "finds that the present action, in so far as it seeks to interfere with their free use of the said common pasture up to the Crakaig burn (and no other trespass on the Crakaig farm is alleged against the defenders) is incompetent," and "recalls the interim interdict, and dismisses the action."

Now, I really am unable to understand by what process of reasoning the Sheriff-substitute comes to that conclusion. He begins the conduct of the process by substantially refusing any proof of possession, and then he allows evidence to be led of possession in the course of the proof, and then he finds certain facts in reference to possession, and thereupon he finds the action incompetent, and recalls the interim interdict, and dismisses the action. Now, perhaps it might be thought sufficient for the present purpose, without further criticising the mode of conducting the process by the Sheriff-substitute, to say that his finding that that process was incompetent can never by any possibility be res judicata to bar an action which undoubtedly is competent for trying the question. An action dismissed as incompetent cannot prevent the pursuer of that action from raising a competent action to try the same question. It would be just as absurd to say that because an action had been dismissed as irrelevant, therefore the pursuer of that action could never bring a relevant action to try the same cause. That question was raised in the well-known case of Russell v. Gillespie (July 22, 1859, 21 D. (H. of L.) 13, 31 Scot. Jur. 641, and 3 Macq. Appeals, 757), where the House of Lords held, reversing the judgment of this Court, that the fact of the second action being relevant when the first action was irrelevant was a complete answer to the plea of res judicata. It appears to me that this kind of incompetency is a case a fortiori altogether. If the former action was incompetent the case could not be tried, and was not tried, under it, and therefore that plea falls to the ground.

Then as regards the second defence, it appears that the party has mistaken his position altogether. The object of this action is to establish—independently of the operation of the Crofters Act altogether, and without prejudice to any application which may be made to the Crofters Commission for giving additional land to the defenders—what were the rights of parties at the time the Crofters Act was passed. That does not interfere with the operation of the Crofters Act. On the contrary, it rather seems to me to clear the way to let in the operation of the Crofters Act, for until it be determined what were the existing rights of parties at the time the Crofters Act was passed, or at the time the application under the Crofters Act was made—until that is determined it is difficult to see what the Crofters Commission could do. Are they to grant additional pasture land to the crofters upon the footing that they already possess this pasture land on the farm of Crakaig, or on the supposition that they do not possess it? I think that would be a great obstacle to the Crofters Commission in determining this case. But a judgment in the present case would remove that, and v shew the Crofters Commission what was the state of the rights of parties a the possession of parties at the time when the Crofters Act was passed an Commission brought into operation. Therefore the plea of forum non conv appears to be a dream in this case altogether. It seems to me this is the venient forum of all others for trying this question.

Upon these grounds I entirely agree with the Lord Ordinary in the conc at which he has arrived in repelling the first four pleas.

LORD ADAM.—The pursuer of this action of declarator is the Duke of S land, and the defenders are certain crofters who claim to have in conn with their crofts certain rights of pasture extending over adjoining g
Now, the declarator in its leading conclusion seeks to have it found and de that the defenders had no right to pasture cattle, and so on, on the far lands of Crakaig. But that does not disclose the real question at issue betwe parties, because if you once establish a right to pasture, the question arises is the extent of the farm of Crakaig? and, as I understand the case, the ders do not maintain any right to pasture cattle upon that farm. Therefo real question does not appear on the first conclusion of this action.
appears upon the second conclusion, where interdict is sought against the ders in particular grazing their sheep or bestial to the west of the line n
A B on the plan produced, being the eastern boundary of the said fa Crakaig. The answer to that is in point of fact that that particular line which is, I understand, represented by a wall on the ground, is not the e boundary of the farm of Crakaig, but that the eastern boundary is the b Crakaig, and it is said that the only place where the defenders have pa their cattle is upon the piece of ground in dispute between these two
That is the real question at issue, the question of fact whether or not th boundary of the farm of Crakaig is this wall or whether it is the burn.

Now, in defence four pleas, as your Lordship has said, are stated defenders, but in point of fact these really resolve into two. The first is is res judicata, a certain process in the Sheriff Court having already decide this boundary claimed by the crofters is the true boundary; and in th place, that whether that was so or not, the Court of Session is not the conveniens in which to try this case. These are the two pleas, or rather, the substance of the four pleas which the Lord Ordinary has repelled, an question is, whether the Lord Ordinary is right or wrong in repelling those

Now your Lordship has stated what the Sheriff Court action was. It asked interdict against the defenders pasturing their cattle "upon the far lands of Crakaig." It does not appear anywhere on the face of the petit the Sheriff Court what the boundaries are of that farm. That question, is the question raised in the present action, first appeared in the defences petition in the Sheriff Court, and it is a question that is vital, because respondents were right in saying that the only place where they pastured cattle is beyond that boundary, then of course the Sheriff should have r the interdict, and there would have been an end of the case. The S substitute, as your Lordship pointed out, took a very peculiar view was to my mind a possessory action, and neither more nor less, and i therefore one in which the proof of possession for a period of seven years, any period short of forty years, would be sufficient, and all that was sary to entitle the tenants to have the interdict brought against them refused; and that was the real point in the case to which the proof should have been directed. But instead of that, as your Lordship has pointed out, the only thing of which the Sheriff-substitute allowed proof was the averment in article 2 of the defenders' statement of facts, in which it was averred that, some forty years before, those representing the Duke of Sutherland at the time had laid out on the ground the true boundary of the farm of Crakaig, and that it was then announced to be this particular burn. That was the only thing of which a proof was allowed, but proof was notwithstanding led not only of that but of possession, for which there was no warrant; and thereafter, on considering this proof, the Sheriff-substitute came to the conclusion that the action was incompetent, and he accordingly dismissed it. Now, how an action brought by a party against cattle being allowed to trespass on what he alleged was his ground is an incompetent action I cannot understand. He might have had no ground on the merits for saying that cattle were trespassing on his ground, but how an action which he brought against an alleged trespasser is incompetent I entirely fail to see. That, however, was the result of that action, and I agree with your Lordship that no finding in fact in an action which the Sheriff has found incompetent can avail in barring a subsequent action which is competent.

But besides that, I think that that action being merely a possessory action, any finding come to in it cannot be res judicata. Mr Murray raised a very large plea on this question. He said it was well-known law that no decree of the Sheriff Court, or judgment in the Sheriff Court, can in any case be res judicata. I do not consider it necessary to go into that question in this case, because, as I have said, the case which was in the Sheriff Court was a mere possessory action. The Sheriff, no doubt, is allowed in some cases to determine questions of heritable right, but he has not a universal jurisdiction in questions of that kind. By the 8th section of the Sheriff Court (Scotland) Act of 1877 (40 and 41 Vict. c. 50), the Sheriff has jurisdiction in a limited class of cases to determine questions of that kind, but that is his only jurisdiction. Now this case in the Sheriff Court was not brought under these clauses at all, but just as an ordinary possessory action brought before the Sheriff in the exercise of his ordinary jurisdiction. He had no jurisdiction to determine such a question of heritable right, and if that be so, any findings of his which are said to determine the question of heritable right which is in litigation in the present action cannot exclude the present action. On these grounds I quite agree with your Lordship and the Lord Ordinary that this plea must be repelled.

I have nothing to add to what your Lordship has said about forum non conveniens. I think this is not only the forum convenient, but the only forum to determine this question.

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree with your Lordship that nothing that we decide in this case can interfere in any way with the operation of that most useful and convenient Act of the Legislature, the Crofters Act. That sufficiently appears when we consider what is the principle of the Crofters Act. Whether one agrees with the principle or not it is this, I think, that where a proprietor has allowed a village community to be formed on his estate in those remote districts of the Highlands where there is no employment and no means of subsistence except upon the land, he has given his village tenants an expectation that they will be enabled to support themselves out of the land, and he is unde obligation to furnish them with sufficient arable and pasture land fo purpose of subsistence. That, I take it, is the principle embodied in the and it is worked out by means of a Commission, who are empowered t with questions of rent and also with questions of occupation, and if necess add to the holdings.

Now, one sees that in the end that may be a better thing for the prop than to have to support his tenants under the Poor-law. But it neve intended that these tenants should choose for themselves any part of the most convenient for themselves and belonging to their landlord. If claim a part of the estate as their possession, that is a question of law must be decided by the ordinary Courts, and not by a Commission, whic not deal with questions of right at all, but with questions of expediency the obligation resulting from circumstances of residence, and the obligati the land to maintain the poor who are upon it. It appears to me that the of the farm tenant is a right quite as deserving of consideration by a Co law as the right of the crofter, and where the two interests conflict, the pr tor is the proper person to have the claim settled. That I presume to b reason why the Duke of Sutherland appears here to maintain the right farm tenant. After we have determined whether the subject in dispute b to the crofter community or belongs to the farm tenant, it will then be f Commissioners, if necessary, to assign such holdings as they may think to the crofters.

I agree with your Lordship that there is no good objection to the p action.

Lord Kinnear.—I agree with your Lordship in the chair, and also wi additional observations that were made by Lord Adam.

rent, and to their nieces (the only nieces they had), Julia, Dorothea, and Katherine, nominatim, "and the survivors or survivor of them, in fee." On this conveyance infeftment followed in favour of the whole disponees for their respective rights of liferent and fee, the instrument of sasine being recorded on 7th April 1859. Dorothea (afterwards Mrs Howat), one of the fiars, died in April 1879 without leaving any testamentary writing disposing of her estate, and without having altered the destination in the disposition above referred to. She left one son, William Howat. Katherine (Mrs Costine), another fiar, died in September 1879, leaving a trust-settlement disposing of her whole estate, heritable and moveable, among her "brothers and sisters, or the survivor of them, and the heirs of their respective bodies." One of the brothers who took under this settlement, Horatio Augustus Crichton, died after acquiring right under the settlement, appointing his widow (afterwards Mrs Hay) to be his sole trustee.

Mrs Dickie survived till 1886.

Mrs Hay now raised an action of declarator against, inter alia, William Howat and his father, as his tutor-at-law, to have it found and declared that Mrs Costine was, at the time of her death, vested in one-half of the subjects in question.

She pleaded;—(1) The share of the property referred to in the summons, which was destined to Mrs Howat, having upon her death passed to the other fiars, decree in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the summons should be pronounced.

Mr Howat, as tutor for his son, defended, and pleaded;—(3) The said William Howat junior, as heir-at-law of his mother, the late Mrs Howat, acquired right to her share of the property in question in virtue of the conditio si sine liberis implied in the destination in the disposition of 1859.

Lord Trayner, Ordinary, on 28th June 1890, found "that the deceased Katherine Hay Crichton or Costine was at the time of her death vested in, and heritable proprietrix of, one-half pro indiviso of All and Whole the subjects described in the conclusions of the summons." *

* "OPINION.— . . . The first question, and the only one to be decided at this stage of the case, is whether William Howat is entitled to one-third of the subjects conveyed by the disposition of 1859 as heir of his mother. It is admitted that he cannot successfully claim any share of the subjects under the destination in that conveyance as it stands, for that destination is in favour of three disponees named, 'and the survivors or survivor of them' alone. But he maintains that that destination is to be read as implying a conditional institution in favour of the heirs of each fiar to the share which each fiar took under it.

"I am of opinion that this is not a case for the application of the conditio si sine liberis, &c. So far as I know, this is the first case in which it has been sought to add the implied condition to the destination in an inter vivos deed on which infeftment had followed. I do not say that this may not be competent, but it appears to me that such a case presents more difficulty in the way of implying the condition than the usual case of a testamentary or mortis causa deed. Passing over that difficulty, however, I think there is no room for the implied condition in this case, for several reasons—(1) The conveyance of 1859 is not of the nature of a universal or family settlement, but is a deed of gift of a special subject. (2) It is not a gift in favour of a class, but in favour of persons named and individually chosen by the granters. (3) The gift is destined not only to the persons named, but to the 'survivors or survivor of them,' thus making the survivors or survivor the conditional institutes to a predeceaser, to the exclusion, so far as expressed, of the predeceaser's heirs, and 'it is not likely that when one conditional institute is expressed another should be implied' (per Lord Justice-Clerk Moncreiff in Blair's Executors, 3 R. 365). (4) There is no reason to suppose that the granters of the conveyance had any intention of benefiting the issue

Howat reclaimed, and argued;—It was said that it was entirely novel to apply the conditio to a destination contained in an inter vivos deed, but there was authority for applying it to all destinations.[1] Again, it was said that the conditio would be applied to effect an institution, but not, as it was sought to do here, to make a substitution. But, again, the answer was that authority had determined otherwise.[2] Then, to take up the points specified by the Lord Ordinary, they might be thus answered, viz.:—(1) This was true only of bequests of corporeal moveables;[3] it did not hold in the case of provisions as distinguished from mere legacies.[4] (2) The beneficiaries here were nieces, and the only nieces, of the disponers. That was sufficient to meet the requirements of a case for the application of the conditio.[5] (3) But the only case in which the conditio fell to be applied—it was a presumption as to an institution which had not been made—was where there was an institution actually made which came into competition with it. (4) The elements here insisted on existed in every case of the application of the conditio. (5) The "love, favour, and affection" might well be extended to the son of one of the nieces.

Argued for the pursuer;—It was entirely novel to apply the doctrine of the conditio to inter vivos deeds. It was well said in Bell's Dictionary, "There is no example of this implied condition in our law, where the donation was inter vivos and perfected by delivery." By mere survivance the sisters here took an accrescing fee, just as in the case of a trust title, to the exclusion of the heirs of the predeceaser.[6] There was here no room for the application of the conditio, for the immediate beneficiary, Mrs Howat, herself survived and took. The conditio should not be extended of the disponees, because such issue had no existence at the date of the conveyance, and might never exist; while (5) there is reason to believe, from the 'love favour, and affection' which was the inducing cause of the conveyance, that the granters meant precisely what they said, viz., that on the death of any one of the disponees the surviving disponees should take the benefit by accretion of the predeceaser's share.

"It is unnecessary to examine the cases cited by either party. But it appears to me that the reasoning of the Lord Justice-Clerk in the case of Blair's Executors, which I adopt, is for the most part directly applicable to this case, and is adverse to the defender.

"I think this is a hard case for the defender. His mother could have conveyed to him the third share of the subjects which she took under the conveyance of 1859. What she would have done had the necessity for some act on her part, with the view of excluding her sisters and benefiting her own nominees been before her mind, it is not possible to say. She would very probably have preferred her son to her sister or her sister's representatives, but she might also have preferred her husband to her son. But, having done nothing to alter the destination in the deed of 1859, it must now regulate the rights of parties, and in my opinion, it excludes the defender."

RD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In 1859 these two sisters conveyed a certain heritable rty to themselves and another sister in liferent, and to three nieces specially d and to the survivors or survivor of them in fee. Infeftment followed diately thereafter. One of the fiars died in 1879 without leaving any ment. She was survived by a son, and the question which is now before ourt is, whether that son is entitled to succeed to his mother's share, or ier that share goes to his mother's sisters under the survivorship clause. contended on his behalf that the conditio si sine liberis applies, on the d that the testators acted as parentes to the nieces in making this settle- that it is a family settlement, and that, accordingly, children of prede- g fiars are entitled to the share left to their parent.

is a peculiarity of this case that it does not relate to a mortis causa settle- but to a deed inter vivos followed by infeftment. Whether under any nstances the doctrine of the conditio si sine liberis could apply to such a may be a question, but it is one which does not require to be decided in ase, in the view I take of it. The deed here does not present the charac- ics of a settlement to which the conditio applies. It relates not to the al estate of the donor, but only to a distinct piece of property. It is fore unlike the case of a general family settlement. It does not give to a , but only to certain specified persons selected by the donors. This militates st the idea that the donor is taking the parental position in making the There is also a special conditional institution by which the donors destine hare given to one of the donors to pass to the survivors or survivor of the ns named, when any of them shall die. This fact is unfavourable to the of implied intention conditionally to institute some other class for benefit. these grounds, which are substantially those given by my brother Lord ner, who decided the case in the Outer-House, I am of opinion that the locutor should be affirmed.

RD YOUNG concurred.

RD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I agree in thinking that the Lord Ordinary's ment must be affirmed. I think the deed contains a destination to which ust give effect. On that ground I proceed.

The deed sought to be reduced was a contract executed by these on 15th June 1888, whereby, inter alia, Dick, Kerr, & Company to construct a cable tramway between Stockbridge and Princes St Edinburgh, under the statutory powers of the Edinburgh Northern ways Company, and also to pay the creditors of the Edinburgh Co to the amount of £3000; and whereby, on the other hand, the Edi Company agreed to pay a contract price of £75,000, of which £60,0 to be paid in shares of £10 each, and £15,000 in mortgage debe There were several reasons of reduction, of which these three wer mately pressed,—(1) Because the agreement, having been entere without any opportunity for competition by other contractors, was i travention of a requirement in the Edinburgh Company's Act; (2) b it was illegal, inasmuch as the directors who entered into it wer qualified as being interested in the contract to which it related; a because the contract was carried through by means of a fraudulent s whereby the Edinburgh Company and a minority of the shareh including the pursuer, were defrauded by the majority of the shareholders.

At first only the Edinburgh Company were called as defenders, the other two companies being called by a supplementary summons.*

The transactions, negotiations, and events out of which the agreement arose were very complicated, the nature of the fraudulent scheme which the pursuer sought to prove being that Dick, Kerr, & Company had got their contract on far too favourable terms; that the contract price should have been a third of what it was, and that the interests of the Edinburgh Company had been correspondingly sacrificed; that this was brought about through the influence of the Assets Realisation Company, who had control of a large majority of the shares of the Edinburgh Company, and so had full command of the company. The Assets Company were creditors of the Patent Cable Corporation (the connection of which company with the transactions will appear hereafter) to the extent of £43,314, 19s. The Patent Cable Corporation went into liquidation, and the Assets Company were in danger of losing the money they had advanced, and the case of the pursuer was that they induced Dick, Kerr, & Company to pay this sum of £43,314, 19s., and procured for them in return, and as an inducement or bribe, this favourable contract with the Tramway Company, which, as already mentioned, they controlled.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The agreement libelled having been entered into in contravention of the Edinburgh Northern Tramways Company's Act of 1884, is illegal and reducible at the pursuer's instance. (2) The said agreement not having been entered into in conformity with the said Act of Parliament was ultra vires of the company, and ought to be reduced in terms of the conclusions of the summons. (3) The said agreement having been entered into fraudulently and collusively, as condescended on, and being to the prejudice of the pursuer, decree should be pronounced in his favour as concluded for. (4) The said agreement having been entered into to the prejudice of the Edinburgh Northern Tramways Company by persons disqualified from being directors, and from voting or acting as such, is null and void, and ought to be reduced as concluded for.

The defenders the Edinburgh Northern Tramways Company pleaded;—(1) No title to sue. (2) The statements of the pursuer are irrelevant, and insufficient in law to support the conclusions of the summons. (3) The statements of the pursuer, so far as material, being unfounded in fact, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor.

The pleas for the other defenders were in similar terms.

The following narrative of the transactions out of which the action arose, as disclosed by the proof, is taken from the opinion of the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney):—

"The Edinburgh Northern Tramways Company was incorporated by statute dated 7th August 1884, and was empowered to make certain lines of tramway, and among these were two, the one between Princes Street and Golden Acre, called the Golden Acre section, and another between Princes Street and Stockbridge, called the Stockbridge section. The company was empowered to use mechanical power—that is to say were empowered to lay cable tramways. The capital is (sectio declared to be £90,000, in 9000 shares of £10 each, and the first dir Messrs Boulton, Couper, Galloway, Turnbull, and Waddell, are nam the Act in the usual way (section 54).

* By interlocutor of 10th January 1889 Lord Kinnear sustained the plea of want of title stated by the Edinburgh Company; but on a reclaiming note the Court recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor hoc statu, and sisted the process to enable the pursuer to call the other parties to the agreement as defenders; and that having been done, their Lordships, by interlocutor of 20th March 1889, repelled the defenders' plea that all parties had not been called, and also repelled the plea to title as an objection to satisfy the production, reserving its effect on the merits, and remitted the cause to the Lord Ordinary.

"There are various agreements scheduled and confirmed by th Schedule C is an agreement with the Magistrates of Edinburg schedule E with the Magistrates of Leith; and by both of these con section 2 and section 7 respectively, it is provided that 'all the executed by the promoters shall form the subject of competitio contract.'

"Mr W. H. Beattie, architect, Edinburgh, and Mr G. V. Mann, were among the promoters of the Act, and I suppose there is no that they were the principal promoters. Mr Beattie was afte engineer and Mr Mann secretary of the company.

"There was a company in London called the Patent Cable Tra Corporation, Limited, which had been recently incorporated, and ha engaged in the construction of the Highgate Cable Tramway in L This company had acquired right to certain patents connected with tramways, and the Edinburgh Company entered into a contract with dated 24th October 1884, for the construction of the Golden Ac Stockbridge sections of the tramways authorised by their statute contract price was stated as £93,000, which, however, covered mor the cost of construction, and, among other things, included the ex of obtaining the Act.

"It was provided that the first £5000 of the contract price wa paid by the issue of 500 shares of the company, and the balance be paid, if the company had not sufficient cash, in debenture or in shares. It was agreed that Mr Beattie and Mr Epples (who had carried out the Highgate line) should be engineers f company.

"By an agreement, dated 25th October 1884, between the Patent Tramways Corporation on the one hand, and Mr Mann and Mr on the other, it was, inter alia, agreed that Mr Mann and Mr should indemnify the Patent Cable Corporation against the co obtaining the Act, and the corporation agreed to pay Mr Beattie £ —£5000 in cash, £8500 in debentures of the Cable Corporatio £3500 by transference of 350 shares of the Edinburgh Company.

"The construction of the tramways did not proceed under thes tracts, for reasons which need not be referred to; and on 22d July a second agreement was entered into between the Edinburgh Co and the Patent Cable Corporation, which, following out 'Heads of promise,' dated 31st May 1886, modified the former agreement in v particulars. In particular, the contract price was increased to £9 and it was also provided that the contractors should be at liberty t ceed with one section only, constructing, however, the building driving machinery required for both; and with regard to the s which the contractors might elect not to execute, it was provide the Edinburgh Company, after written notice to the contractors, proceed with the line themselves, subject to arrangements as to ment to the contractors of a proportion of the cost of the buildin driving machinery.

"The contractors elected to construct the Golden Acre section, opened for traffic on 28th January 1888, buildings and machinery able for both lines being also constructed.

"No part of the work was in reality executed by the Patent Cabl poration. It was all done by Dick, Kerr, & Company, as sole contractors, who were paid by the Cable Corporation—at least to a large extent—not in cash, but by debentures.

"All the benefits of these agreements were transferred (1) by the Cable Corporation to a company called the Debenture Corporation by assignment, dated 7th July 1886; and (2) by the Debenture Corporation to the Assets Realisation Company by translation, dated 4th January 1888, although the former deed bears an earlier date than the second contract between the Cable Corporation and the Edinburgh Company.

"It is important to notice that the latter deed of 4th January 1888 was in implement of a contract between the two companies on or about 4th November 1887, and that date, and not 4th January 1888, must be held to be the date when the interest of the Assets Company in the Cable Corporation commenced.

"These assignations were made in security of an advance by the Debenture Corporation, in respect of which the Debenture Corporation received mortgage debentures of the Cable Corporation for £40,000, which they transferred to the Assets Realisation Company. In this way the Assets Realisation Company came to be secured creditors of the Cable Corporation for £40,000 and interest, for which they held Cable Corporation debentures, and they were the assignees of the benefits of the Cable Corporation contracts with the Edinburgh Company. There is no clear information in the proof about the transaction and understanding between the Debenture Corporation and the Assets Company. They were certainly in close alliance, although that alliance does not seem to affect this question. I suppose that on the side of the Assets Company the transaction was a speculative purchase with the prospect of liquidation.

"As the Edinburgh Company seems to have had very little money in hand, and as the contract price was payable to the Cable Corporation to a large extent in shares, it resulted that all the shares, with a trifling exception, came to be held either by the Cable Corporation on the one hand, or by Mr Beattie and Mr Mann on the other.

"The qualification of each director was ten shares, and each of the original directors received ten shares, i.e., fifty shares altogether, representing a nominal value of £500, but they did not pay any part of that price. The arrangement was that £2 per share was to be held as representing directors' fees, and the remaining £8 per share was supplied through an arrangement with Beattie and Mann, into the details of which it is unnecessary to enter.

"The outcome, however, was that the Cable Corporation came to be possessed of a large majority of the shares of the Edinburgh Company, while Beattie and Mann held a number of these shares, but were in a hopeless minority. There was not much said at the proof about Mr Rixon, the pursuer, and he was not a witness. He holds five shares in his own name, and is alleged by the defenders to hold them as Beattie and Mann's nominee. But that seems only imperfectly proved. At all events it was not disputed that he has the full right and title of a shareholder.

"Although the Cable Corporation held the Tramway Company shares, it is plain enough that the Cable Corporation was entirely in the hands of its mortgagees, who were, firstly, the Debenture Corporation, who were replaced by the Assets Company; and, secondly, Dick, Kerr, & Company, who were postponed mortgagees. The mortgages clearly more than exhaust the Cable Corporation's assets, and thus it was the mortgagees rather than the Cable Corporation who had the substantial interest in the Edinburgh Tramway Cable Company.

Rixon v. Edinburgh Northern Tramways Co.

"Mr Harold Brown* is agent of the Assets Company, and it ap to me that in transactions which he originated and carried throu acted primarily in the interests of the Assets Company, first in m what seemed an advantageous although a speculative purchase of the Corporation Debentures, and afterwards in protecting their int which seemed imperilled by the financial condition of their debto Cable Corporation.

"Mr Brown was also agent for the Debenture Corporation, and h for some time agent of the Cable Corporation, but he resigned that a when he foresaw a probable conflict of interests between the Cabl poration and the Debenture Corporation.

"Having acquired the Cable Corporation debentures, and thus th mary interest in their assets, Mr Brown directed his attention to these assets, and among them the Edinburgh Tramway, available did not regard with favour the Edinburgh management, and he th that the only or the best means of making the Edinburgh Tram success was to get the Stockbridge section constructed, because that fully utilise the cost of the buildings and machinery, which, as a mentioned, had been made to work both sections.

"With the view of securing complete control over the Tramway pany, he divided the Cable Corporation shares among various no shareholders, so as to increase their voting power, under the 44th s of Table A of the Companies Clauses Act, and so as to make sure c voting the Edinburgh holders, who, as I gathered, resorted to the plan.† The effect was to give a voting power on behalf of the Company of 673 against 291.

"The transfers by which the holdings of these nominee shareh were created are mostly dated on 29th November 1887, but it seer to have been until 28th February 1888 that Mr Brown put his into operation by insisting on the resignation of the Edinburgh dir replacing them by four gentlemen, Messrs Balfour, J. M. Broad, C Brown, and Salmon, and removing the business to London. N these new directors had any beneficial qualification, but were all nor of the Cable Corporation or the Assets Company.

"Mr Brown took the further step of obtaining the appointmen judicial factor on 20th March 1888.

"In the meantime proceedings were taken for the liquidation Cable Corporation, and on 14th January an order to wind up wa nounced, and on 13th February Mr Annan, who had for four years secretary of the Assets Company, was appointed liquidator. It do signify in whose name the petition for liquidation was brought. The I think, be little doubt that practically this appointment was ow the action of the Assets Company, or perhaps, to speak more exac Mr Harold Brown.

---

* The Lord Ordinary referring to his evidence said,—"The individu contrived and carried out the whole scheme was unquestionably Mr Brown, partner of the firm of Linklater & Company, solicitors, Londo any fraud was committed he had the principal share in it; and indeed I that almost the whole case will be found in his distinct, and, as I thought I heard it, candid evidence, although of course the pursuer will not conced Mr Brown's candour was equal to his exceptional ability."

† The Lord Ordinary observed in regard to this,—"The power of a holder to increase his voting powers by the creation of fictitious holders to savour of a device to evade the Act of Parliament. But the legality was not challenged, and does not seem doubtful.—(See Buckley (5th ed.) Lindley on Company Law, 309, and cases there quoted)."

Rixon v. Edinburgh Northern Tramways Co.

"After the liquidation it became of course the duty of the liquidator to realise the assets, and it became the duty of Mr Brown, as agent for the Assets Company, to take steps to ensure that the price would pay the claim of his clients as first mortgagees. They both depone that they made various efforts in that direction without success, but that Dick, Kerr, & Company, the second mortgagees, were at last induced to become the purchasers of the whole Cable Corporation assets at a price equal to the claim of the Assets Company. Practically what Dick, Kerr, & Company agreed to was to clear their second mortgages of the mortgages of the Assets Company, which were in front of them.

"This agreement was embodied in a contract dated 22d May, to which the parties were the liquidator, the Assets Company, and Dick, Kerr, & Company. By this agreement the liquidator and the Assets Company agreed to sell to Dick, Kerr, & Company all their interest in the various assets of the Cable Corporation in the hands of the liquidator, which assets are enumerated in a schedule to the agreement, and seem to have been of a very miscellaneous character. One of them consisted of the shares in the Edinburgh Northern Tramways Company. The price was fixed at £43,314, 19s., to be payable at the periods mentioned. The assets were not assigned, and were not to be assigned until payment to the extent specified. Full payment has not yet been made, and the shares of the Edinburgh Company have not yet been transferred to Dick, Kerr, & Company. They are still in the names of the nominees of the Cable Corporation and the Assets Company. The agreement was besides necessarily dependent on the sanction of the Court being obtained to the act of the liquidator, and provision was made for the event of that sanction being refused. Now, it appears that an application to the Court for confirmation of the agreement was strongly opposed by Mr Bullivant, a gentleman who had been chairman of the Cable Corporation, and was besides an unsecured creditor. He complained that the interests of the Cable Corporation were sacrificed by the agreement, and that the assets were worth much more than the sum which Dick, Kerr, & Company agreed to pay. His views and that of the liquidator were supported by affidavits, with the result that, after discussion and investigation, the agreement was confirmed, but not until 6th August. The fact that the agreement was judicially confirmed after discussion in Court may negative the idea that the price to be paid by Dick, Kerr, & Company was too little, but it throws no light on the other question, whether it was too much, which is what the pursuer's argument in this case certainly implies.

"While the agreement was thus in abeyance, Mr Brown further occupied himself in endeavouring to get the Stockbridge line constructed. He did so, he says, because he believed that the construction of that line would greatly increase the value of the shares of the Edinburgh Company, and because he was materially interested in increasing the value of that property, because if the agreement with Dick, Kerr, & Company was not carried out, he had to consider the Edinburgh shares in the light of a security which he might have to hold. He expresses his view thus:—'My interest for the Assets Company was first of all, if I could, to sell the assets for an amount not less than our mortgage, and secondly, if I failed in that, to make the asset as valuable as I could to hold.' His difficulty, however, was that there was no money wherewith to pay a contractor, and that any contractor would require to be satisfied with an issue of shares and debentures. He says that he considered the Edinburgh Company at the time was in bad credit, and that its shares were worth little or nothing.

"In these circumstances, after endeavouring in vain to induce the Assets Company to embark on his scheme, he had recourse to Dick & Company, who at first refused to make the venture, but ultim agreed to offer for the line. He depones that he thought it wo utterly useless to advertise for offers. The bargain with Dick, K Company was made on 1st June at a meeting of the directors Edinburgh Company, when there were present Messrs Balfour, Bro Salmon, and it was afterwards embodied in the agreement date June, which this action seeks to reduce. The parties to that agre are the Patent Cable Corporation and its liquidator, the Edi Northern Tramways Company, and Dick, Kerr, & Company. Its m stipulations are (1) that Dick, Kerr, & Company should constru Stockbridge section, and should pay the debts of the company £3000; and on the other hand, that the contract price should be £ whereof £60,000 should be satisfied in fully paid-up shares, and £ in mortgage debentures. This agreement received the confirmation Court on the following day—16th June 1888.

"The execution of this contract has proceeded notwithstandi action, and the Stockbridge section has been opened, but th been done under a provisional arrangement as to the payment of Kerr, & Company, in the event of the agreement of 15th June reduced. No plea of bar arises or is stated.

"The contract had not been submitted to the shareholders of the burgh Northern Tramways Company when this action was raised. said that this happened through oversight, but it was afterwards con at a general meeting. * "OPINION.—[After the narrative quoted above]—The first argume rested on the want of any competition for the contract, and on the clause agreement with the Magistrates of Edinburgh and Leith, schedules C an the Act above quoted. The plea has been dealt with by Lord Kinnear- 16 R. p. 656]. I concur in and refer to his opinion. I think the ob not one which the pursuer has any title to take, and I think that th persons in titulo to take it are the Magistrates of Edinburgh and the Mag of Leith. I do not consider that the case The Caledonian Railway Co March 13, 1874, 1 R. (H. L.) 8, quoted by the pursuer, supports his tion. It merely shews that such agreements have statutory force, but n the statute converts them into agreements with the public or with ind shareholders.

"I think the plea that the contract was illegal because the directo disqualified is also bad, and that the pursuer as an individual shareholc no title to plead it. I did not understand the pursuer's counsel to ple the directors had no true qualification, and were disqualified because the mere nominees of the Assets Company. If such an argument had been I rather think it must have been disallowed on authority,—Buckley, Lindley, p. 301; Pulbrook v. Richmond Consolidated Mining Company, Div. 610. The objection that the directors were disqualified because the interested in the contract appears to me not well founded, whether the d

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The agreement of 15th June 1888 ought to be set aside upon two grounds. I. It was ultra vires of be regarded as representing the interests of the Cable Corporation or of the Assets Company. In either case their interests, supposing they had interests, were the same as those of the Edinburgh Company. There was no conflicting duty. They were not contracting with the company, but for it. It was argued that this was not so if the contract of 1888 were to be regarded as what it professes to be, supplemental to and a mere modification of the prior contracts of 1884 and 1886; but although there may be subtlety in this view, there is, I think, no substance. The contract of 1888 was really a new contract. The plea pressed by the pursuer is an equitable plea, founded on the assumption of a conflict between the personal interest of a director and his duty as a director, and where there is no such conflict the rule has, I think, no place. During the debate I felt a little doubt whether the directors did not fall to be regarded as the nominees of Dick, Kerr, & Company, in which case the argument of the pursuer would have had more force. But I think they cannot be so regarded; and I rather think that even if they were, the objection to the contract which would thence arise would be one which could be, and has been, waived by the majority of the company.

"The plea founded on fraud raises more difficulty, because it involves the consideration of intricate and complicated negotiations and arrangements, in which it may well be that fraud may lurk. Although it may generally be the case that a contract which is a fraud on a company is not void but only voidable, and may be accepted and validated by the company, and that where that is the case the title of a single shareholder to reduce it cannot be sustained, yet it does not seem doubtful that the rule admits of this exception, that where a contract amounts to a fraud by a majority of shareholders on the minority, such a contract may be reduced at the instance of any shareholder who has been so defrauded.—Atwool v. Merryweather, L. R., 5 Eq. 464; Menier v. Hooper's Telegraph Works, 1874, 9 Ch. App. 350; Mason v. Harris, 1879, 11 Ch. Div. 97. The previous decision of the Court in this case amounts to a judgment to that effect.

"The present is clearly a case to which that principle is applicable. If there has been any fraud it has been a fraud practised by the majority of the shareholders on the minority, and against which the minority could have no remedy except through the Court. If such a fraud has been proved in this case, the contract ought to be reduced. Now, whether there has been such a fraud or not is just a jury question, as to which impressions and opinions may differ, but my own impression was when the proof was being led, and remains after consideration and examination of the documents, that no fraud has been proved. I think that the evidence of Mr Harold Brown is substantially true, and while it shews that he was looking keenly and acutely after the interests of his own clients, it does not shew that he disregarded or acted adversely to the interests of the Edinburgh Northern Tramways Company.

"The pursuer's conjecture is intelligible enough, and it cannot be said that his suspicion is altogether unreasonable. The idea seems to be that Mr Brown, in order to secure payment of the £43,314, 19s. due to the Assets Company, agreed with Dick, Kerr, & Company to secure to them through the influence of the Assets Company the contract for the Stockbridge section on too favourable terms, if they in return would pay the debt due to the Assets Company by the Cable Corporation, which must in that view be held to have exceeded the value of the Cable Corporation assets. All the witnesses concerned deny most absolutely that there was any such agreement; and there certainly was none unless these witnesses are all to be disbelieved. There is no direct proof whatever of such an agreement. There may, however, have been a fraud without any such express agreement, and indeed it was in no view to be expected that such an express agreement would be proved. The device of filling the directorate of the Edinburgh Northern Tramway Company with nominees of the Assets Company may the company. (a) The terms of the contract were that Dick, Kerr, & Company were to be paid £75,000, £60,000 in fully paid-up shares, and £15,000 in mortgage debentures. But by the 39th section of 47 and 48 Vict. cap. ccxli. (Edinburgh Northern Tramways Act, 1884), the Tramways Company could not issue shares in payment of expenses to the extent of more than four-fifths of their liability, or in other words they could not make an issue of capital without a cash payment to the amount of one-fifth of the nominal value of the shares. Dick, Kerr, & Company had not made any cash payment. Accordingly it followed that the company could not give them any shares. (b) There had been an issue of shares at a discount in this case, inasmuch as £75,000 of shares had been given to Dick, Kerr, & Company in payment of work done, which only represented a cost to them as contractors of £25,000. Such an issue was struck at by the provisions of the Companies Acts, 1862 and 1867, and the point had been conclusively settled by the case of Klenck.[1] II. The agreement ought also to be set aside because it was tainted with fraud. The minority of the shareholders, of whom the pursuer was one, had been defrauded by the majority. It was only through the Court that the minority could obtain a remedy, and it was not necessary in order to entitle the minority to have this remedy that they should have suffered an individual wrong. If the majority divided the company property the company was thereby wronged, and excite suspicion and challenge inquiry, but such suspicion cannot, I think, supply the proof of a direct fraud.

"It might be shewn that the conditions of the contract are so unfair as themselves to prove fraud, and they would prove fraud if the pursuer's contention were established, that the contract price is three times what it ought to have been; but I think there is nothing of the kind established. Parties are not much at variance as to the probable cost of making the Stockbridge section. Both sides put it at £25,000 or thereby. The question is not about that at all but about the value at the time of the shares of the company. £60,000 to be paid in shares, having regard to the financial condition of the company, was a very different thing from £60,000 to be paid in money. Evidence has been led on both sides on this point. It would serve no good purpose to examine it; but after considering it, I am not prepared to say that the contract price was excessive, or so excessive as to warrant the conclusion that it must have been agreed to in fraud of the company. There was evidence led by engineers and contractors that contractors might have been got at more reasonable terms; and it is said that the contract should have been put up for competition. Ex facto evidence of this kind must be considered with caution, and I do not see in it sufficient reason to disbelieve the evidence of Mr Brown and the other witnesses, who are satisfied that it would have been useless to attempt to get outside contractors. It was submitted for the pursuer that the proceedings adopted by the Assets Company, the removal of the Edinburgh directors, and in particular the appointment of a judicial factor, were taken with the deliberate intent of discrediting the Edinburgh Company, and reducing the nominal value of the shares, so as to enable them the more readily to deter competitors, and to favour Dick, Kerr, & Company. I cannot find that such a design has been proved, and I find no sufficient ground for inferring it.

"The question is not whether the directors made a bad bargain, but whether they made the bad bargain knowingly or in disregard of the interests of the company, with the intent to sacrifice the interests of the company and the minority, in order to save and protect the interests of the predominating shareholder, whose nominees they were? I am of opinion that that has not been proved, and that the reasons of reduction ought to be repelled."

was for it to sue. But if the company declined to sue, there was then an exception to the general rule, which was given effect to in Foss v. Harbottle,[1] and the minority were entitled to sue without conjoining the company. This exception to the rule of Foss' case was supported by the case of Merryweather,[2] the rule in which had been applied in more recent cases,[3] one of which, that of the North-West Transportation Company, was very much in point. Not that it was in the power of a minority to challenge the action of a majority in every case of the kind. For instance, it had been held that a single shareholder could not, on behalf of himself and all other shareholders except the directors, ask an injunction to restrain the directors from carrying out a proposed compromise, which was alleged to be very prejudicial to the company, without submitting it for the approval of the shareholders.[4] But the present was a case where the majority had obtained a benefit to the prejudice of the minority. Dick, Kerr, & Company, who were practically the directors of the company from 1st June 1888 (when the Assets Company agreed to sell to them their building), were to receive £75,000 of the shares of the company in return for work which cost them only £25,000. The truth was that all parties to the agreement under reduction were interested to see the contract price fixed at as large a sum as possible, and so were the Assets Company, who had a leading share in bringing about the agreement, as Dick, Kerr, & Company were indebted to them in the sum of £43,314, 19s. The evidence pointed to this that the agreement was made by the directors ultra vires with the knowledge of the company, and against the interests of the shareholders, with a firm of contractors who were the nominees of the directors. If the majority of the company had voted themselves shares ultra vires that would have justified the interference of the Court, and this was what they really had done in a modified way. There were elements here which were wanting in the case of the Transportation Company, and this was just the case which was figured by Sir Richard Baggallay of the exercise by the directors of the company of their voting power of so oppressive a character as to invalidate the adoption of the agreement. It was to be inferred from the nature of the transactions that the agreement now under reduction was dependent upon the previous agreements and contracts which were set forth on record, and that they were counterparts of one another, and all hung together. The result was that by the contract of 22d May 1888 (to which the Assets Company and the liquidator of the Cable Corporation were parties on the one hand), it was arranged that the Assets Company should hold the whole shares of the company in the names of nominee shareholders in trust for the Assets Company in security, and that Dick, Kerr, & Company practically stepped into the position of the Cable Corporation, and the property passed to them subject to the lien which the Assets Company had for the price of £43,314, 19s. After that date the shares could not have been sold without the leave of Dick, Kerr, & Company, for the nominee shareholders became trustees for Dick, Kerr, & Company. The contract of 1st June was for work to be done, and no specification or estimate was taken.

Accordingly, it was impossible to fix a proper price for the work, and indeed the real value of it was left indefinite, because payment was to be made, not in money, but in money's worth. There was nothing to show how the value of the shares—in which the price of the work was to be paid—was arrived at.

Argued for the respondents;—The questions at issue were really questions of fact. There did not appear to be much difference between the parties on the law of the case, which was well settled. I. No doubt had been thrown upon the views expressed by Lord Kinnear in the note appended to his interlocutor at the previous stage of the case (16 R. 655). The grounds upon which a contract between a director in his representative capacity and himself as an individual could be set aside, were fully set forth in the old case of Blaikie.[1] Such a contract might be well made, although, if it was ultra vires, it was absolutely void, or if it was brought about by fraud or undue influence, it would fall to be set aside. There was no case in which it had been held that, in the absence of these two elements, a minority could get the better of a contract which had been made by the majority and approved by the company.[2] Upon the merits of the case the directors were not the nominees of Dick, Kerr & Company, when the contract was entered into, and the contract had to be confirmed by the Court. When the agreements of 7th May and 14th June were entered into the Tramways Company were in such a position that it was necessary for the salvage of the property to find someone to advance the money necessary to enable them to meet their pressing liabilities. The time they had was also very limited. In regard to the want of specification for the Stockbridge line, the parties found that they could proceed upon the lines of the specification for the first section. It supplied a sufficiently intelligible basis as to the cost of the second, the cash price of which was about £25,000. The bargain was a fair one, seeing there was nothing to offer to the contractors beyond shares and debentures. The reclaimers had not succeeded in making out any case upon the head of fraud. II. It was said that the agreement was ultra vires because it involved the issue to Dick, Kerr, & Company of shares at a discount. This contention had not been raised upon record and there was no plea to meet it. The Court could not therefore entertain it. The pursuer's shares were in the same position. But further it was to be remembered that the agreement was executed under the greatest difficulties, at a time when no other way of carrying it through was possible. It was not necessary that a money consideration should be given for shares; money's worth was sufficient.[3]

At advising,—

Lord Adam.—This is an action of reduction of an agreement dated 15th June 1888, entered into between the Cable Corporation, John Annan, the liquidator of that company, the Tramways Company, and Messrs Dick, Kerr, & Company.

The main ground of reduction is that the agreement was entered into by the parties fraudulently and to the prejudice of a minority of the shareholders of the Tramways Company, of whom the pursuer Mr Rixon is one.

In order to understand the fraud alleged it is necessary to explain the situation in which the several parties to the agreement stood to each other at its date.

The Tramways Company was incorporated by the Edinburgh Northern Tramways Act, 1884, which authorised the construction of certain tramways, and, inter alia, one called the Golden Acre section, and another called the Stockbridge section.

It may be premised that the shares of the Tramways Company have never been offered or issued to the public, so that that company had no cash with which to pay for the construction of the tramways, their only means of doing so being by the issue of shares or debentures of the company.

On the 24th October 1884, the Tramways Company entered into a contract with the Cable Corporation, by which the latter undertook the construction of the two sections of the tramways before mentioned.

By this contract the Cable Corporation undertook, at their own cost, to provide the land, and to erect buildings thereon for the company's works, and to pay the cost of and incident to obtaining the company's Act.

The price or consideration to be paid by the company was £93,000, but as the cost of the lands and buildings to be erected thereon had not been fixed, but had only been estimated at £7250, it was agreed that should the actual cost exceed or fall short of that sum the contract price should be correspondingly increased or diminished.

The price was to be paid, as to £5000 thereof, by the allotment and issue to the Cable Corporation, or to persons to be nominated by them in writing, of 500 fully paid-up shares of the company, and the balance by monthly instalments on the certificates of the engineers. In the event of the company not paying in cash, the Cable Corporation agreed to accept payment in Lloyd's bonds—in fully paid-up £10 shares of the company, to be issued either to the corporation themselves, or in their option to their nominees—or in mortgage debentures; and the company undertook not to issue, without the previous sanction of the corporation, any shares beyond 150 shares necessary for the directors' qualifications except in payment to the corporation.

On the 25th October 1884 an agreement was entered into between the Cable Corporation and Messrs Beattie and Mann, who had been promoters of the Tramways Company, by which it was agreed that Messrs Beattie and Mann should relieve the corporation of their obligation to pay the costs of and incident to obtaining the Tramway Company's Act, and in respect of that undertaking that the corporation should pay them a sum of £17,000 to cover such costs. This sum was to be paid as follows—£5000 in cash on the execution of the agreement; £8500 in debentures of the Cable Corporation on the opening of any part of the Tramway Company's line; and £3500 by the transference of Tramway Company's shares to that amount by the Cable Corporation to Messrs Beattie and Mann.

It appears that £5000 was paid on the 25th October 1884 in cash by the Cable Corporation to Messrs Beattie and Mann, and that they also paid, under the agreement of 24th October, £2000 as the price of the ground required for the tramway works, and that the company issued 150 shares for the qualification of the directors. Neither of the agreements, however, appear to have been further implemented at this time. The construction of the tramway lines w not proceeded with in consequence of disputes and litigations having taken pla between the parties. These, however, were ultimately compromised, and t result of the compromise was embodied in a supplementary agreement of 2 July 1886. By this agreement the Cable Corporation granted to the Tramwa Company licence to use certain patents, and agreed to pay the costs of obtaini an Act for extending the time for constructing the tramways, and in resp thereof the contract price was increased from £93,000 to £98,000.

It was further agreed that the Cable Corporation should be at liberty proceed with the execution of both the Golden Acre and Stockbridge secti of the tramways, or either of them, and that should they select to proceed w only one of such sections, it should not be compulsory on them to carry the other, save and except that they should execute and supply the neces buildings, boilers, &c., for the whole tramways embraced in the contract. the event of the Cable Corporation only carrying out one section a deduct was to be made from the contract price, the amount, in case of difference, to settled by arbitration.

The Cable Corporation proceeded with the execution of the Golden A section only, which was completed and opened for public traffic on 3 January 1888.

At this date 4500 fully paid-up shares of the company had been issue payment of the contract price and otherwise, with the result that of these sh about 3190 were held by the Cable Corporation or their nominees, and remainder—1310—apparently almost wholly by the nominees of Messrs Bea and Mann. It is unnecessary, however, for the purposes of this case to go i detail in this matter, because it is obvious that the Cable Corporation, thro their nominees, had the means of acquiring the entire control of the Tramw Company.

In July 1886 the Cable Corporation borrowed from the Debenture Comp £40,000, in respect of which the Cable Corporation issued to the Deb Company £40,000 in first mortgage debentures of £100 each. These consti a first charge on the capital and whole assets of the Cable Corporation.

In November 1887 the Assets Company purchased from the Debenture C poration £39,600 of these debentures, and to that extent became first mortga on the assets of the Cable Corporation.

In December following the Cable Corporation became insolvent, and Assets Company resolved to realise the assets of the corporation in orde secure payment of their debt. The Assets Company appear to have left i the hands of their agent, Mr Harold Brown, to take such proceedings as m appear to him to be necessary or desirable for this purpose.

As has been stated, part of the Cable Corporation assets consisted, be debentures, of 3190 shares of the Tramways Company. Mr Brown was satisfied with the management of that company, and in December 188 intimates to the directors that the Assets Company were determined to the control of the company, and in February 1888 he procured or compelled resignation of the then directors and the appointment of new directors, were nominees of the Assets Company. After this Mr Brown became for the Tramways Company as well as of the Assets Company.

On 13th December 1887 the Assets Company, in virtue of powers conta in the debentures acquired by them as aforesaid, appointed the defender be the receiver of all the property charged by the debentures, and on ruary 1888 they obtained an order from the Court of Chancery duly g Mr Annan receiver and manager on behalf of themselves and the benture-holders of the company. On 14th January 1888 an order e at the instance of a creditor for winding up the Cable Corporation, 13th February 1888 Mr Annan was appointed by the Court official r. So far as I can see there was nothing irregular or improper in these gs.

these proceedings were being taken Mr Brown was endeavouring to purchaser for the assets of the Cable Corporation, and among others he o the defenders Messrs Dick, Kerr, & Company.

That debt amounted with interest to , 19s., and Dick, Kerr, & Company ultimately agreed to purchase at e. The terms of the purchase are set forth in an agreement dated 22d 38, to which Mr Annan, as liquidator of the Cable Corporation, the ompany, and Dick, Kerr, & Company are parties. By this agreement 19s. of the purchase-money was payable to the Assets Company on the n of the agreement, £10,000 on the 22d November 1888, and £29,000 2d May 1889. It was further agreed that if the said sums of £10,000 ,000 should not be paid, the said sum of £3714, 19s. should be forfeited, assets resold as the Court might direct. It was further stipulated that idator and the Assets Company should forthwith apply for the sanction ourt to the agreement, and that if such sanction should not be obtained hree months from the date of the agreement, the agreement should , and the Assets Company should repay the said sum of £3714, 19s. ction of the Court was subsequently obtained, but not until August greement being contingent on the sanction of the Court, it is obvious the event of such sanction not being obtained, the assets, including the y Company's shares, would be left on the Assets Company's hands. Mr says, and I believe quite truly, that seeing this, and believing that it y doubtful whether the Court would sanction the sale, and also that it sible that Messrs Dick, Kerr, & Company might not be able to implement art of it, he resolved to do what he could to increase the value of these that he thought that the success of the company depended on the Stock- section of the tramway being constructed, as buildings and machinery en erected to work both sections, and that, entertaining these views, he l Dick, Kerr, & Company to undertake the construction of that section tramways, and accordingly the agreement of 15th June 1888 sought to ced was entered into.

Rixon v. Edinburgh Northern Tramways Co.

By it Dick, Kerr, & Company undertook to construct the Stockbridge sectio of the tramways, and to provide from time to time such sum, not exceedi £3000, as might satisfy the present creditors of the company, except the clai of Messrs Beattie and Mann.

The price to be paid by the Tramways Company was £75,000, where £60,000 was to be paid in fully paid-up shares of the company, and £15,0 in mortgage debentures, to be satisfied by monthly instalments of shares a debentures upon monthly certificates by the engineers of the line.

It was further agreed that the Cable Corporation and the liquidator sho release the company, and that the company should release the Cable Corporat and the liquidator of all claims hinc inde.

The liquidator undertook forthwith to apply for the sanction of the Court the agreement, and if such sanction was not obtained within six months agreement was to be void, and in the event of the company being at any t wound up by the Court, Dick, Kerr, & Company were to be at liberty to de mine the agreement.

The sanction of the Court was applied for and obtained on 16th June 18 so that the agreement became a binding agreement. It is this agreement w is sought to be set aside on the ground of fraud, and the fraud alleged is forth in the 13th article of the condescendence.

Shortly stated, the fraud alleged is that Dick, Kerr, & Company agree purchase from the Assets Company the assets of the Cable Corporation much larger sum than the assets were worth, and that the Assets Compan order to reimburse Dick, Kerr, & Company, agreed to obtain for them, by m of the control they had of the Tramways Company, a contract for the cons tion of the Stockbridge section at a price sufficient not only to pay for the struction of the line, but also to repay them for their over-payment to the A Company in respect of their purchase of the assets of the Cable Corpora No doubt if this were true the contract would be a fraud on the Tram Company, and to their prejudice to the extent of such over-payment, a will further be observed that the loss would fall, ex hypothesi, on the s holders of that company other than the Assets Company, because that com would be reimbursed for their loss as shareholders by their gain as sellers o assets of the Cable Corporation.

I agree with the Lord Ordinary that there is no direct proof whatever o such fraudulent scheme. All the persons concerned are examined as witn and they deny most emphatically that there was any such agreement or such scheme as that alleged.

It appears to me that the pursuer can have no possible case unless h shew in the face of these denials that fraud is nevertheless necessarily to b sumed from the facts and circumstances of the case.

The Lord Ordinary remarks that there may have been a fraud without such express agreement. It might be shewn, he says, that the conditions o contract are so unfair as in themselves to prove fraud, and they would fraud if the pursuer's contention were established, that the price was times what it ought to have been; but there is, he says, nothing of the established, and this seems to be the main ground on which the Court is to presume the existence of fraud.

I agree with the Lord Ordinary that there is nothing of the kind establi The actual cost of the construction of the Stockbridge section would appe t £25,000. The price in the contract was £75,000, but this included which Dick, Kerr, & Company were to advance in payment of the com- debts. This price, however, was merely nominal, as £60,000 was to be shares of the company and £15,000 in debentures. The company had , and could only pay in shares and debentures. The real price therefore ed on the value of these shares and debentures at the time. The shares icular were of very little value, and in my opinion it is not shewn that ce was excessive. The price was a speculative one; whether it has out a good or a bad bargain for Dick, Kerr, & Company there is no evidence .

her, in considering the probability or improbability of any such fraudu- eme having been entered into, it appears to me that it would have been improvident arrangement for the Assets Company to have entered into assumption that the contract price was an extravagant one. The agree- or the purchase of the assets of the Cable Corporation by Dick, Kerr, & ny was contingent on a very doubtful event—that the sanction of the should be obtained to it, and this sanction had not been obtained on the une, when the agreement sought to be reduced was entered into. But reement was not contingent on sanction being obtained to the agreement May, so that it was very probable that the Assets Company might have ft with the Cable Corporation assets in their hands, and have still been to pay the contract price under the agreement of 15th June to their own shareholders of the Tramways Company.

oes not appear to me to be probable that so acute an agent as Mr Brown have advised the Assets Company to embark in a scheme likely to lead a result. I can see no evidence of fraud with reference to the agreement June.

it is further maintained by the pursuer that the agreement of 15th June ntered into by the directors, who held their qualification in trust for, and nder the control of, the majority of the shareholders of the company, with areholders for their benefit, and to the prejudice of the company, and that ore the agreement is null and void, or at least voidable. It is true in point of at the directors were the nominees of the Assets Company and were under control, and that the agreement was entered into for their benefit; but it r their benefit only because they were shareholders of the company, and e it was believed to be a contract for the benefit of the company. It is hat the interest of the Assets Company and the Tramways Company in atter was identical. Whatever was for the benefit of the shareholders of mpany was for the benefit of the company.

e directors were in no way under the control of Dick, Kerr, & Company, ere not contracting in their interest.

reover, the agreement has since been confirmed by the company at a al meeting, and if, as I think, there is no fraud in the matter, that is con- e.

e only other matter that requires to be referred to is the plea that the contract ra vires of the company because it did not form the subject of competition. plea is founded on a clause in a contract between the Lord Provost, strates, and Town-Council of Edinburgh and the promoters, which is con- d by the incorporating Act, to the effect that all the works to be executed ld form the subject of competition and contract. Ship—Carriage of goods—Delivery.—In discharging a cargo of salt, in bulk, part of the cargo was lost through defects in the gearing of the by reason of which some of the contents of the buckets in which the s swung ashore was jerked out, and fell between the ship and quay. The party bore that the cargo was to be "brought to and taken from alongside." that this obligation had not been implemented, and that the ship was li the loss.

Ship—Demurrage.—The time occupied in loading a vessel is not, absence of stipulation, to be lumped with the time occupied in discharg to the effect of working off by extra despatch in the one operation de incurred by delay in the other.

A charter-party provided,—"Cargo to be loaded and discharged as steamer can receive and deliver during usual working hours. If detained, demurrage to be paid at the rate of £12 per day." At the loading the ship was detained a day and a-half beyond the time in wh could have been loaded. The ship's agent, in advising the despatch vessel, wrote to the shippers,—"If you give us really good despatch and m charges at Peterhead, I will try and get my folks to meet you in this n On the arrival of the ship at the port of discharge extra time was worke the result that the vessel was discharged a day sooner than she would ha under ordinary conditions. In an action raised for the demurrage for a a-half, the shippers claimed that they were entitled, lumping the pe loading and discharge, to escape on payment of a half day's demurrage. (diss. Lord Young) that they had no such right under the charter-par the letter of the ship's agent imported no such right, and therefore t full amount of demurrage incurred at the port of loading was due.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Aberdeen, &c. I.

BY charter-party dated 6th July 1889, the Avon Steamship Co agreed to carry for Leask & Company, shipbrokers, &c., Peterhead, of salt amounting to 650 tons or thereby in bulk from Liverpool to head. The charter-party bore,—"The said cargo to be brought to and from alongside free of expense and risk to the ship." Further,—" to be loaded and discharged as fast as steamer can receive and during usual working hours. If longer detained, demurrage to b at the rate of £12 per day. It is also agreed that the owners of th vessel shall reserve to themselves the right of lien upon the cargo on board, for the recovery and payment of all freight, dead freig murrage, and all other charges whatsoever."

The bill of lading bore, and it was not disputed, that in loadi Liverpool there had been "delay 1½ days." The ship's agent, w to Messrs Leask & Company just before the ship went to sea, s "The 'Avon' sails from Liverpool to-night, and should reach y Sunday. I am sorry this steamer has been delayed 1½ days or so waiting cargo. If you give us really good despatch and moderate charges at Peterhead, I will try and get my folks to meet you in this matter."

On arrival of the ship at Peterhead, Leask & Company, at considerable expense to themselves, by working overtime, beginning at four in the morning and working till eleven at night, succeeded in unloading the vessel in a day less than would have been required had they worked ordinary working hours only.

In unloading the vessel at Peterhead, which is a tidal harbour, it was found that the arm of the derrick, by which the tubs or buckets of salt were swung out of the hold, was too short to swing them on to the quay, and that it was necessary to rig up an additional derrick. As the tubs passed from the one to the other, they were so jerked or shaken that a considerable quantity of salt was lost between the ship's side and the quay.

Messrs Leask & Company paid the freight less £6, 10s. 9d. The Ship Company now sued them for this balance of freight, and for demurrage in respect of the delay at Liverpool. They pleaded their charter-party.

The defenders explained, with regard to the former claim, "that through the defective gearing of the ship, a considerable portion of the cargo was lost in being unshipped. The deduction from freight of £6, 10s. 9d. here referred to, represents the value of short delivery, after allowing for natural wastage according to custom." They pleaded accordingly.

With regard to the latter claim, they referred to the letter of the pursuers' agent, and narrated the extra despatch given in unloading. On this they pleaded;—3. (1) Any delay in loading was compensated for by extra despatch in unloading; and (2) by the terms of the charter-party no demurrage is therefore due.

After a proof, from which the facts above set forth appeared, the Sheriff-substitute (Brown), after findings in fact, found in law, "that the defenders, not having received the whole of the cargo shipped, are entitled to retain the balance of freight sued for, and that the negotiations between the parties, and the proceedings that followed thereon, constitute an implied agreement that unusual despatch in the unloading of the vessel should be imputed pro tanto in satisfaction of the claim for demurrage: Decerns against the defenders for the sum of £6, being the balance of demurrage due, with interest as concluded for; and, quoad ultra, assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the action." *

* "NOTE— . . . The pursuers, relying on the terms of the charter-party that the cargo 'is to be brought to and taken from alongside free of expense and risk to the ship,' and on the general principle of law, that the duty of providing and making proper use of sufficient means for the discharge of the cargo lies with the charterer, contend that their obligation does not go beyond delivery at the ship's side, or over the rail, and that the merchant must bear any loss against which he has failed to make adequate provision. The defenders, on the other hand, take up the position that the ship should have come to Peterhead prepared to discharge her cargo according to the custom of the port, and that the waste of the cargo having resulted from the failure to have proper appliances to deliver, the charterer must suffer. I feel myself unable to decide the case entirely on a choice between these two opposing views. In my opinion, the charterers are wrong in their contention that the custom of the port is incorporated with the contract, for there is not a particle of evidence that the parties contracted with reference to it, or that it was known beyond one side, or that notice of any kind was given of it, and it seems to me to be settled law in this class of case, that unless local usage is made part of the contract, or was known to both parties, it cannot be regarded. Reference indeed was made by the defenders recent case of Wyllie v. Harrison & Company, Oct. 29th, 1885, 13 R. 9 it seems to me they take no advantage from anything that was there de because, in the language of more than one Judge, the local custom was 'woven into the contract,' and I do not read the observation of Lord that the words, 'as customary,' although not expressed, were implied to that any local usage was thereby incorporated with the contract, or to doubt on the general doctrine that a particular custom is not binding with ence to which parties do not contract. The real point of the defenders, case stands, it seems to me, is not so much that the discharge of the car regulated by the custom of the port of Peterhead, as that there is scarce appreciable difference between that and the measure of the pursuers' obl to deliver under the contract.

"On the other hand, I think the pursuers maintain the general princip delivery at the ship's side or over the rail determines the subsequent risk with the charterer somewhat too broadly. That is undoubtedly the rule, admits of being qualified by circumstances (Postlethwaite v. Freeland, Ca. (H. L.) 599), and, in my opinion, the facts of this case, when fairly preted, operate very materially to control the result. The cargo in questi delivered in bulk, and the carts on which the defenders say it fell to charged, according to the custom of the port, were ranged as nearly as p alongside the ship. A cargo in bags might be literally enough taken over merchant at the ship's rail, but it is difficult to see that buckets or tubs salt could be similarly handed. The pursuers quoted the case of The Shipowners' Company v. Grimond, July 4th, 1876, 3 R. 968, in illustra their obligation to deliver under the contract, but there the cargo, stowed in was left on the quay, and it appears to me not an unreasonable interpreta the ship's duty in this case to hold that the merchant was entitled to delivery, and if so, I think it is quite plain, upon the evidence, that it simple an operation to put the salt upon the carts as to deposit it upon the But my interpretation of the evidence is that a number of defects in the g of the vessel, e.g., the shortness of the arm of the derrick, which had to be co sated by the rigging up of another, the heaviness of the ship's chains, a undue proximity of the masts to the hatches, made it impossible for the give proper discharge in one way or another. Salt was lost not only b the quay and the ship's side, but on the ship itself, and, in my opinio defenders succeed in shewing that the original cause of the whole mischi the unfitness of the vessel, with her appliances, to discharge such a carg tidal harbour like Peterhead. The attempt made to shew that an appr loss was sustained in carting the salt from the breakwater, in my op wholly failed.

"I feel that the second question in the case is attended with difficulty. is no stipulation in the charter-party providing for the defenders' cont that they are entitled to lump the delay in loading the vessel with the de given in discharging, so as to bring out the true balance of damage sus by the ship, and in connection with this point, the pursuers, in the very argument submitted on their behalf, relied on the case of Marshall, 1880, 6 Q. B. D., 231. It seems to me, however, that that case has only a application, because there there was a question of different rates, requirin two parts of the contract to be separated, and there are here, in addition, ci stances of a very special character. The claim and counter claim are ej generis, and there being nothing in the charter-party to exclude compens I think the pursuers cannot be heard after having, through their auth agent, induced the defenders to incur trouble and expense in giving facil the discharge of the cargo, to say that a mere promise to adjust the diff does not operate, at least pro tanto, to discharge the claim to demurrage.

ted to have been incurred at the port of loading: Therefore repels defences; decerns in terms of the conclusions of the summons."*

he defenders appealed, and argued;—The lay-days here in which ship was "to be loaded and discharged" were by the charter-party ped together. The case of Marshall[1] implied that there were circum- ces in which demurrage might be compensated by despatch at the other inus, for the judgment there was put on the separation of the two ations in the charter-party.[2] As regarded the obligation of the ship to ver, that was satisfied not by merely placing the goods on the rail, but anding them to the consignee on the wharf.[3] That might be qualified llegation and proof of custom in any particular port,[4] for the custom he port was imported into all contracts. But here there was neither gation nor proof of any such custom. If then the ship was bound to the goods on the quay, she had insufficient appliances for doing so; e the loss; hence the liability.[5] rgued for the pursuers;—No lumping of the two periods was to be umed,[6] and it was certainly not contracted for. If it were to be held liability for demurrage could be thus wiped out, what became of the over the cargo for demurrage, for it must be all discharged before it d be ascertained whether there was or was not any demurrage? The

"NOTE.— . . . I think it is very likely that, in emptying the salt the carts, and in carrying it to the steelyard, a considerable quantity was on the quay. But is the ship answerable for this? It is the duty of a el to deliver the cargo by raising it from the hold and swinging it on to the r, and if any loss arises in that part of the operation, which is clearly trace- to her fault, she is responsible. But when the goods cross the rail, the terers' men being there to receive them, her responsibility ends, and if any thereafter happen, which is due to the manner in which the goods are lled or the carts laden, the charterer is himself answerable. The case of ish Ship Co. v. Grimond, 3 R. 968, so states the rule, and I think on the ence the proof fails to attach any responsibility to the ship.

The second question in the case turns on the meaning of a certain letter, ten in the following circumstances by the ship's agent to her addressees n she was on her voyage. At Birkenhead, the port of loading, demurrage he extent of £18 had been incurred, and the letter says in effect—'You ady owe us £18 for delay in loading, but if you give us really good despatch moderate charges at Peterhead, I will try and get my folks to meet you in matter.' It is evident that this did not amount to a contract—even when d on, it is nothing but a promise to negotiate for some concession on the of a ship, but how much was to be conceded was left quite uncertain, and gether the letter is too indefinite in its terms to bind the ship to anything. ppose that, before the ship left Birkenhead, the £18 had been paid, could the enders have got it back on her arrival in Peterhead, because, on the strength the above letter, instead of confining themselves to the stipulated ten hours ay, they had kept working from four in the morning till eleven at night, as point of fact they did? In other words, could they have claimed 'despatch ney' when both the charter-party and the subsequent correspondence were nt about it? I apprehend not, and, therefore, with some reluctance, I am ged to hold that the original charter-party remains without qualification the measure of the rights of the parties."

obligation to discharge was satisfied when the goods were placed on the ship's rail.[1] She was not bound to do anything outside herself.[2]

At advising,—

LORD TRAYNER.—The claim of the pursuers in this action consists of two items,—(1) the sum of £6, 10s. 9d., which they say the defenders have improperly deducted from freight due to them, and (2) £18 for demurrage.

With regard to the first item, it appears from the record and proof that there was a short delivery of the cargo in question to the value of the sum now in dispute, and that the defenders retained that amount out of the freight due by them to the pursuers. There can be no doubt,—indeed it is not disputed,—that the defenders were entitled to set off the amount of the short delivery against the freight, provided the short delivery arose from any cause for which the ship is responsible. The proof makes it quite clear how the short delivery was occasioned. The cargo (which was salt in bulk) was taken out of the vessel's hold in tubs, and in swinging it across from the vessel to the wharf, considerable quantities of the salt were thrown or jerked off and fell into the water between the ship's side and the wharf. This, farther, appears to have been caused not by any carelessness on the part of the stevedore's men, but by the inefficient character of the ship's appliances for delivering the cargo. Even if the loss had been occasioned by the carelessness or fault of the stevedore's men, the ship would have been responsible, because the stevedore and his men were the servants of the ship, not of the consignee. But however the loss was occasioned, it was occasioned before the cargo was delivered to the consignee. It was maintained by the pursuers that they were not responsible for any loss which happened after the cargo had passed over the ship's side—that the ship fulfilled its obligation by putting the cargo on the ship's rail; and the case of Grimond (3 R. 968) was cited as an authority for these propositions. The decision in that case does not support the pursuers' contention. It was there held that delivery had been completed when the cargo had been put over the ship's side into the hands of the consignee's servants, which is a very different thing from merely swinging the cargo over the ship's side or placing it upon the rail of the ship. Apart from this, the extent of the pursuers' duty in reference to the delivery of the cargo must be ascertained from the terms of their charter-party. Now, it is there provided that the cargo is "to be brought to and taken from alongside free of expense and risk to the ship." The ship therefore is to put the cargo at the port of delivery "alongside," as the consignee is only bound to take it from "alongside." But "alongside" is necessarily outside of the ship, and consequently, putting it on the ship's rail would not be compliance with this provision of the contract. Nor would merely swinging the cargo over the rail of the ship be fulfilment of the contract in any reasonable sense. The meaning of such a stipulation as that in the charter-party in question is that the shipowner or charterer shall in delivering the cargo place it outside and alongside the ship in a place from which and at which the consignee may take it. I am therefore of opinion that the loss of cargo in the present case took place while cargo was still under the control of the ship, and before delivery was comed, and that for that loss the ship is responsible.

now come to the other item in the pursuers' claim, namely, the claim for urrage. It is admitted that demurrage to the extent sued for was incurred he port of loading, but the defenders maintain (1) that that claim was ed by extra despatch at the port of discharge; and (2) that the pursuers ed to give up their claim for demurrage incurred in the loading if they got od despatch" at the port of discharge, and that this was, in point of fact,
n. The first of these views depends on a construction of the clause in the ter-party. It provides,—"Cargo to be loaded and discharged as fast as ner can receive and deliver during usual working hours." Under this pron the defenders maintain that they are entitled to lump the time occupied oth loading and discharging, and that they are not liable for demurrage if can shew that the time occupied both in loading and discharging did not ed the time in which the ship would have received and delivered the cargo ring usual working hours." I cannot adopt this construction of the charter-y. I think the obligations to load and to discharge are separate. Each of e operations is to be performed "as fast as the ship can receive and deliver," a failure in the performance of either as stipulated results in the obligation ay demurrage. Two considerations go to strengthen this view in my mind.
first is that where it is intended to lump the time for loading and discharghis is usually stated expressly in the charter-party, and the second is that e defenders' view was adopted it would virtually read out of the charter-y the important provision that the ship should have a lien on the cargo for urrage—(Marshall, 6 Q. B. D. 231). The defenders' other ground of nce, that the pursuers agreed to give up their claim for demurrage on a conn which was fulfilled, has not been substantiated. The pursuers' letter d on to prove this defence does not amount to an abandonment or discharge e claim for demurrage already incurred, but merely indicates that if extra atch was given in the discharge of the cargo, an effort might be made to ge that claim favourably for the defenders. I think the defenders read the uers' letter as meaning more than that, and that they gave extra despatch he discharge of the cargo at extra cost and trouble to themselves, in the f that they would thereby get rid of the claim of demurrage. Whatever I think of the pursuers' fairness or unfairness in insisting on that claim in circumstances, I am of opinion that they are not barred from insisting upon nd are entitled to decree for the amount of the demurrage incurred at the of lading.

ORD YOUNG.—My brother Lord Trayner was good enough to favour me with rusal of the opinion which he has just read, and I entirely concur with him he first point. I think that the cargo was lost to the extent stated, owing he fault of the ship.

n the other point I should not have ventured to differ from his Lordship

But the ship may act otherwise if it pleases; it may the shipper to work double tides another day. If the ship invites him to d and he does it with the result that the ship is not in the end unduly dete at the port of loading, there would be no demurrage there. I make the observation with regard to the port of discharge. There is no obligation o ship to allow delivery to go on day and night. But here, again, if the invites him to make up for delay at the port of lading, and he does so, wit result that the ship is not unduly delayed, taking the two periods togeth am of opinion that there is no claim for demurrage.

The claims are ejusdem generis; for necessary and unavoidable detentio ship gets nothing extra. That is covered by the freight. If there is detention the cost of that is regulated by the contract. According to sense the result is that if, taking the loading and discharge together, there extra detention, then nothing is due beyond the freight.

I repeat that the shipper cannot make up for the delay once incurred e with the approbation of the ship. But here the ship invited, nay solicited shipper to do this. The letter we have before us may not amount to a con But the invitation was acted on. In discharging the vessel they worked teen instead of ten hours, and that they did for the sake of the ship. The it because the ship solicited it, to let her away, and this letter induced the do so, in the expectation that it would be taken into account as agains undue delay at Liverpool. The shipowner now turns round and says there no contract. He may be right, but I am certainly not disposed to assist in that contention.

The only authority cited to us as against the law which I have indicat in my opinion the law of this case was a case before two Judges of the Qu Bench in 1880. I think that case is not in point, but if it were I shoul assent to it. WALTER MALCOLM MURRAY, Pursuer (Respondent).—Murray—Craigie.
REV. JOHN M'EWAN (Parlane's Trustee), Defender (Reclaimer).—C. S. Dickson—Guy.

Discharge—Confusio—Right in security—Ground-annual.—A lady, by trust-disposition and settlement, directed her trustees to dispone certain heritable subjects to a person named, "under burden of any heritable securities that may affect the same, and the feu-duty, ground-annual, and other burdens affecting it." Prior to the date of her settlement the truster had obtained assignations to the only ground-annuals affecting the subjects. She subsequently paid up a bond affecting the subjects, and took an assignation thereto. Held (1) that the bond had been extinguished confusione, and that the disponee was entitled to the property free of the burden of this bond, but (2) (diss. Lord Young) that he must take the property under burden of the ground-annuals, that being the intention of the truster as expressed by her settlement.

2D DIVISION. Lord Kinnear. M.

In 1863 Mr Robert Johnston, a builder in Glasgow, had acquired certain land on which he built houses, which were called "Cleveland Buildings." In order to facilitate further building undertakings, he sold these Cleveland buildings to Charles England, his nephew, Mr England undertaking to pay two ground-annuals of £19, 4s. 1d. and £19, 18s. 1d. to the Bank of Scotland. The contract incorporating the sale and the creation of these burdens was dated in 1863. By back-letter England declared that he held the subjects in trust for Johnston, and bound himself to reconvey when required to do so.

Mr England, by bond and disposition in security of even date with the contract of sale, burdened the subjects with a sum of £1800 borrowed from one Simons. No part of this sum was ever paid to England, Johnston receiving it all.

Mr Johnston died in 1868, leaving a universal settlement in favour of his wife.

At Mrs Johnston's request England disponed, on 4th August 1868, the subjects to Thomas Murray, an old friend of her own, who again granted her a back-letter in the same terms as that granted before by England to her husband.

In 1871 the widow, having paid up debts due by her husband to the bank, obtained an assignation to the ground-annuals over Cleveland Buildings, and recorded it in the Register of Sasines.

By trust-disposition and settlement dated 11th March 1873 the widow, who had now become Mrs Parlane, directed her trustees to convey the subjects in question to Thomas Murray, "under burden of any heritable securities that may affect the same, and the feu-duty, ground-annual, and other burdens affecting it."

In 1874 she paid up the debt due to Simons of £1800, taking an assignation to the bond. The title to the subjects still stood in Murray.

Mrs Parlane died in 1889, and Murray then raised an action to have it declared that he was entitled to the subjects, and that they were no

* "OPINION.—The question depends upon the intention of the testa expressed in her will. She gives the pursuer certain property in G
'under burden of any heritable securities that may affect the same, and t duty, ground-annual, and other burdens affecting it, with entry as at th immediately preceding' her death. The pursuer is therefore entitled property free from the burden of all securities, except such as validly af of Peter Simons, did not so affect the land. At the date when the w the pursuer was a mere trustee for the testatrix, and held the lands the testatrix indicated an intention that the debt should be kept up as the estate, but assuming it to be a reasonable inference, the debtor's in would be unavailing to create or maintain a security upon land. If th were still affected by the bond after the testatrix had paid the debt, it that she must have held a security over her own estate preferable to an bond which she might have granted to other creditors, either before or af date of the assignation. This appears to me an untenable position. Th the security was necessarily extinguished as soon as the debt was paid.

"The ground-annuals are in a different position. These are ex fac intended them to pass to the pursuer along with the property. The te the settlement are, in my opinion, conclusive to the contrary. There is a able distinction between the terms of the direction applicable to the g annuals, and that which applies to heritable securities. The latter are r to generally as securities which may affect the property, which can only such as may be found to affect it when the will comes into operation. F ground-annuals are mentioned along with feu-duties as existing burde which the property is actually affected when the will is executed. It do appear that the subjects were ever burdened with any other ground-annua subject to the burden of the ground-annual. The language appears susceptible of no other construction. . . ."

transaction is assignation, not receipt. This is an element in the question."[1] "Confusion is not presumed."[2] If confusion was not to be presumed, there was at the most no positive evidence of intention.

Argued for the pursuer;—"If no interest of the creditor interferes to make it desirable to keep up the debt it is held to be satisfied and extinguished confusione."[3] "Confusion . . . is not admitted in any case where there is a distinction of character or interest in the person who, being debtor, afterwards becomes creditor in that debt."[4] "Where anyone is pleno jure the ultimate debtor and creditor in the same debt without relief, that situation in general amounts to confusion and extinguishes the debt."[5] "By the law of Scotland obligations are extinguished confusione when the same person becomes both debtor and creditor in his own right, because no person can be creditor or debtor to himself."[6] What interest was there in the creditor here, making it desirable to keep up the debt? None. What distinction of character or interest was there in her? She was pleno jure debtor and creditor without right of relief. Therefore confusio operated. Nor was there any room for distinguishing the ground-annual from the bond. They were both mere securities, the accompanying conveyance being to insure punctual payment. Nor was it reasonable to make the distinction the Lord Ordinary had made between the bond and ground-annual. The bond was plainly intended to be discharged, and no reason could be suggested why the ground-annuals should not follow the same course.

At advising,—

Lord Justice-Clerk.—The late Mrs Parlane directed her trustees to convey to the pursuer certain heritable property in Glasgow, but she declared this conveyance to be "under burden of any heritable securities that may affect the same, and the feu-duty, ground-annual, and other burdens affecting it." At that time there was against this property a bond for £1800 in favour of Peter Simons. Mrs Parlane, who was the representative of her late husband, was the debtor in that bond, but it appears that in 1874 she obtained an assignation of the bond, and so extinguished the bond. The property was thus freed and relieved of the bond. The Lord Ordinary has held that the bond was extinguished confusione, and I am clearly of opinion that his Lordship was right: the security has ceased to exist.

But there is another question in the case, viz., whether certain ground-annuals secured over the property still subsist, and whether the disponee must take the property under burden of them. Now, before the testator executed her deed she had herself become entitled to the ground-annuals. That being so, it was argued that they do not now affect the lands, and that the disponee is not bound to take the lands under that burden.

That is quite a different question from the question about the heritable bond. These ground-annuals are ex facie irredeemable, and the fact that they are in her person united with the right to the property does not militate against the idea that she could give her property to another under that burden. The question will turn on the terms of the deed by which the grant is made. Now, not only does she make a general declaration that the property is to be taken with its burdens; she does more, she expresses distinctly that he is to take it under the burden of the ground-annual affecting it.

That is a distinct expression of her will, and I am accordingly of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be affirmed.

LORD YOUNG.—With respect to the heritable security there is no difficulty. I agree with your Lordship and with the Lord Ordinary.

With respect to the ground-annuals I have had great difficulty, and on the whole I am disposed to read the will differently from your Lordship and the Lord Ordinary. I think the meaning of the will is—the pursuer is to take the property as he would have taken it had he been her heir in the property, i.e. under burden of the feu-duty, ground-annuals, and heritable bonds affecting it at her death; the pursuer is to take the property with all its engagements,—its obligations. Any of these obligations she might remove during her life she would remove for his benefit. She bought up the heritable debt. That was then gone, and gone for his benefit.

I think the same reasoning applies to the ground-annuals, which did exist and which were removed. She bought them up also. There is no longer in the sense of her will a ground-annual over her property.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I agree in the result of the Lord Ordinary's opinion.

As regards the heritable bond there is not much difficulty. I think it was extinguished confusione.

The matter of the ground-annuals is different and somewhat difficult. The position of matters is this—before the will was made the testator had become both debtor and creditor in the ground-annuals. The question is whether they were thus extinguished confusione. I do not agree with the Lord Ordinary that this was prevented by the fact of there being two separate estates. A ground-annual is nothing more than an obligation for payment of an annuity secured over the heritable estate. That is quite a different matter from the two estates of dominium utile and superiority for example, which never can be consolidated confusione.

What moves me is the intention of the testator; I think she intended the ground-annuals to be a burden on her gift, and I do not think we should allow confusio to operate so as to defeat that intention.

LORD TRAYNER.—I am not prepared to dissent from the Lord Ordinary's view that the ground-annuals, being irredeemable rights, perfected by infeftment, could not be extinguished confusione. But, however that may be, I agree with him in thinking it clear that the testatrix intended that the pursuer should take the lands in question under burden of the ground-annuals. As regards the heritable debt of £1800, I agree with the conclusion at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived, for the reasons given by him.

Ship—Shipping casualty appeal—The Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. c. 104), sec. 242—"Wrongful act or default"—Expenses.—In an inquiry at the instance of the Board of Trade into the circumstances of the loss of a steamship in the Bristol Channel, it was proved that she suddenly sprang a leak at night when a few miles from shore; that the master, who was on the bridge, was at once informed of the leak by the engineer, and on looking into the engine-room saw an inrush of water through the engine-room floor; that he thereupon gave orders to have the engines stopped, but failed to have the water-tight bulkhead closed and to use the pumps; that he then took to the boats along with the crew, and the vessel sank shortly afterwards. The Sheriff-substitute found that the master was in "default," in terms of the 242d section of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, and suspended his certificate.

The Court refused an appeal by the master, holding that his failure, through unreasonable panic, to take measures open to him with a view to saving the ship amounted to a "default" on his part, but found no expenses due, as the bulk of the evidence led and printed related to a portion of the case which was departed from by the Board of Trade when the case came before the Court of Session.

1st DIVISION. C.

JAMES BROWN, formerly master of the steamship "Ashdale," of Glasgow, appealed under the 2d section of the Shipping Casualties Investigations Act, 1879, &c., against a decision of the Sheriff-substitute of Lanarkshire (Erskine Murray) with assessors, finding that he had been in fault, in terms of the 242d section of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854,* in prematurely abandoning his vessel, and suspending his certificate for six months. The decision appealed against was given on the conclusion of a formal investigation held at Glasgow on 17th and five following days of October 1890 into the circumstances attending the loss of the "Ashdale," an iron steamship of 117 tons register, in the Bristol Channel, on 10th September 1890.

In their report to the Board of Trade, the Court found, "for the reasons stated in the annex hereto, that the 'Ashdale' sank in consequence of an inrush of water into her engine-room, the cause of which is not apparent: suspends master's certificate for six months. . . ."

Appended to the report was an annex from which it appeared that the "Ashdale" was on a voyage from Cardiff to Tralee when the accident occurred. It bore, inter alia;—"After taking in a full cargo of coals, with a little coke and bunker coal, she left Cardiff at 3 P.M. of the 9th September, at her usual draught when loaded, with a freeboard of about 12 inches, having on board a crew of eleven hands all told, including James Brown, the master, who held a certificate of competency No. 91,514, Thomas Dearness, engineer, and Duncan M'Kerrell, the second mate. After adjusting compasses she discharged her pilot off the Nash Point between 5 and 6 P.M., and proceeded down the Bristol Channel at full speed, making seven knots per hour, the weather being fine, the wind light, and the sea smooth. From 8 P.M. to twelve noon it was the master and second mate's and second engineer's watch, during which the course steered was W. by N., and a light was seen and passed, which the second mate supposed was the Bull Light, but which was in reality Lundy Light.

Rixon v. Edinburgh Northern Tramways Co.

By it Dick, Kerr, & Company undertook to construct the Stockbridg of the tramways, and to provide from time to time such sum, not e £3000, as might satisfy the present creditors of the company, except th of Messrs Beattie and Mann.

The price to be paid by the Tramways Company was £75,000, £60,000 was to be paid in fully paid-up shares of the company, and in mortgage debentures, to be satisfied by monthly instalments of sh debentures upon monthly certificates by the engineers of the line.

It was further agreed that the Cable Corporation and the liquidato release the company, and that the company should release the Cable Co and the liquidator of all claims hinc inde.

The liquidator undertook forthwith to apply for the sanction of the the agreement, and if such sanction was not obtained within six mo agreement was to be void, and in the event of the company being at wound up by the Court, Dick, Kerr, & Company were to be at liberty mine the agreement.

The sanction of the Court was applied for and obtained on 16th Ju so that the agreement became a binding agreement. It is this agreeme is sought to be set aside on the ground of fraud, and the fraud alleg forth in the 13th article of the condescendence.

Shortly stated, the fraud alleged is that Dick, Kerr, & Company a purchase from the Assets Company the assets of the Cable Corporat much larger sum than the assets were worth, and that the Assets Com order to reimburse Dick, Kerr, & Company, agreed to obtain for them, of the control they had of the Tramways Company, a contract for the tion of the Stockbridge section at a price sufficient not only to pay for struction of the line, but also to repay them for their over-payment to th Company in respect of their purchase of the assets of the Cable Cor No doubt if this were true the contract would be a fraud on the T Company, and to their prejudice to the extent of such over-paymen will further be observed that the loss would fall, ex hypothesi, on th holders of that company other than the Assets Company, because that would be reimbursed for their loss as shareholders by their gain as selle assets of the Cable Corporation.

I agree with the Lord Ordinary that there is no direct proof whateve such fraudulent scheme. All the persons concerned are examined as w and they deny most emphatically that there was any such agreement such scheme as that alleged.

It appears to me that the pursuer can have no possible case unles shew in the face of these denials that fraud is nevertheless necessarily to sumed from the facts and circumstances of the case.

The Lord Ordinary remarks that there may have been a fraud with such express agreement. It might be shewn, he says, that the condition contract are so unfair as in themselves to prove fraud, and they woul fraud if the pursuer's contention were established, that the price w times what it ought to have been; but there is, he says, nothing of t established, and this seems to be the main ground on which the Court to presume the existence of fraud.

I agree with the Lord Ordinary that there is nothing of the kind esta The actual cost of the construction of the Stockbridge section would ap

Brown v. Board of Trade.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The steamship "Ashdale," of which the appellant was master, was in the months of August and September last sailing under a time charter, and in obedience to instructions by the charterers she loaded a cargo of coal at Cardiff to be carried to Tralee. At 3 P.M. of 9th September she left Cardiff. About 1.5 A.M. of the 10th it was found that the vessel had sprung a leak. The fact was made known to the master, who was then on the bridge, by the chief engineer, Dearness, who rushed on deck, shouting that the ship was sinking. The master looked down into the engine-room, where he noticed water coming up under the platform, in what appeared to him to be two large spouts. Thereafter the master and whole crew betook themselves to the boats saved their lives, and left the ship to sink, without any effort to keep her afloat

We have carefully considered the evidence laid before the Court below, and have received valuable advice and assistance from the two Elder Brethren of the Trinity House who sat with us as assessors in the hearing of the arguments of counsel; and in accordance with their advice, and with our own view of the evidence, we have come to the conclusion that there is no valid ground for impeaching the judgment of the Court below.

In the circumstances in which the master was placed he had a double duty to discharge, to take all possible and necessary measures to save life, and also to save the ship. These duties may come into conflict, but they are not incompatible, and the master was not entitled to devote himself entirely to the one without giving any consideration to the other. He failed to give orders to close the sliding door in the water-tight bulkhead, or to use the pumping gear with which the ship was well supplied. In short, he did nothing towards stopping or abating the leak, and at last, on the suggestion of one of the crew, he gave orders to stop the engines, which put an end to all chance of saving the ship.

It is impossible to resist the conclusion that in so acting the master was under the influence of a panic, originated no doubt by the chief engineer, but a panic which it was the duty of the master to resist and quell. It is precisely in such an event that the master is bound not only to exercise self-control and to apply his own judgment calmly to the emergency, but also by every means in his power to influence the crew by giving distinct and peremptory orders, and so to dispel the panic.

We are not called on to determine whether if the master had done his duty the ship would, or would probably, have been saved. The question is whether he did his duty, and gave the ship a chance of remaining afloat till she could be rescued, or whether he failed therein, and we cannot resist the conclusion that there was such failure.

Two cases were cited on behalf of the appellant, one which occurred in this Court—(Watson v. Board of Trade, 22 S. L. R. 22)—and another, which is reported in L. R. 7 Prob. Div. 207. But these cases exhibit a contrast to the present. In each the master, in a position of great peril and embarrassment, exercised his judgment calmly and to the best of his ability in deciding between two courses. In each he committed an error of judgment, as was proved by the result. But he was absolved from all blame, because he adopted what in a case of great difficulty his experience and judgment dictated to him as the better course of two.

Dec. 18, 1890. Brown v. Board of Trade.

But here the fault is no error of judgment, but a failure by the master to exercise his judgment at all,—a surrender of his judgment to the influence of an unreasonable panic. This is a fault utterly unworthy of and inconsistent with the character of a British seaman. We therefore refuse the appeal.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

The Solicitor-General moved for expenses as the appeal had been unsuccessful,[1] but the Court were of opinion that no expenses should be given, in respect that a large portion of the evidence at the investigation had related to a portion of the case which was departed from by the Board of Trade at the hearing before the Court of Session.

THE COURT refused the appeal, but found no expenses due.

JAMES RENNEY, Pursuer (Respondent).—Asher—Younger.
MAGISTRATES OF KIRKCUDBRIGHT, Defenders (Reclaimers).—C. S. Dickson—Crole.

Ship.—Reparation—Harbour—Contributory negligence of master of vessel—Expenses.—A sailing vessel, on entering a harbour, got aground and suffered damage, for which the owner sued the harbour trustees. At the time of the accident the vessel was within the limits of the jurisdiction of the harbourmaster, but there were two local pilots on board, and it was proved that the accident was due to the fact that a wrong course was steered. Both the harbourmaster, who gave directions from the shore, in answer to inquiries from the vessel, and those on board the vessel were ignorant that the tide had begun to ebb, thus making the navigation more difficult.

In an action of damages at the instance of the owner of the vessel against the harbour trustees, held (rev. judgment of Lord Trayner) that although the harbourmaster was in fault in the directions which he gave, there was contributory negligence on the part of those in charge of the navigation of the vessel, and defenders assoilzied.

The defenders were found entitled to expenses.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Trayner. C.

THE vessel "Janets and Ann," of Chester, of 175 tons gross measurement, arrived from Dublin off Kirkcudbright on the afternoon of Friday, 23d March 1889.

On her way into the harbour, and when within the jurisdiction of the harbourmaster, she struck upon a bank and sustained considerable damage, amounting to, as alleged, £300, for which Mr James Renney, the owner of the vessel, brought an action against the Magistrates of Kirkcudbright, as trustees of the harbour.

The pursuer averred that the accident was occasioned by the faulty directions of the harbourmaster, which those in charge of the vessel had obeyed, as they were bound to do.

The defenders averred that if those in charge of the vessel had steered a proper course, and had obeyed the orders of the harbourmaster, no accident would have happened.

The pursuer pleaded;—The pursuer having suffered the loss and damage sued for through the fault of the defenders, or those for whom they are responsible, is entitled to decree as craved.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The alleged injury to the said vessel the "Janets and Ann" not having been caused by any fault or negligence on the part of the defenders, or of those for whom they are responsible, they are entitled to absolvitor, with expenses. (3) Those he result of the proof as to the nature of the accident and its causes thus summarised in the Lord Ordinary's note:—"It is proved that, n the schooner had reached a point in the river about 130 or 140 s from the west pier of the dock, she was in mid-channel, or nearly She was, at all events, in a sufficient depth of water to float safely, if she had dropped anchor there, or had proceeded up the river on course she was then following, she would not have gone aground. At point, however, she put her helm a-port, and, in consequence, took a se which led her on to the bank or shore, where she grounded. When schooner was at the point I have mentioned, a man on board of her ed Smith [he was one of two local fishermen who had been taken on d the vessel as pilots] hailed the defenders' harbourmaster, who was ding on the west pier-head, and asked him to let them know when to anchor. This was a proper proceeding on the part of Smith, because schooner was then within the jurisdiction of the harbour authorities, subject (as is admitted on record) to the harbourmaster's orders. harbourmaster heard Smith hailing (although, as he says, he did not what Smith said), and in reply waved his arm, and cried out 'Come which was interpreted by Smith to mean that the schooner was to e on towards where the harbourmaster was standing, to do which essitated the porting of the helm, and the helm was accordingly ported. y soon afterwards, Smith, who knew the schooner was approaching a gerous bank or beach, hailed the harbourmaster again, asking him to sure and tell them when to drop anchor, the reply to which was the ntinued waving of the harbourmaster's arm, and another call to 'Come .' Smith saw the waving, but did not hear the call, which the harbour- ster admits he gave. Almost immediately after Smith had hailed the ond time, the harbourmaster gave orders to drop the anchor, and at the ne moment the schooner struck."

t further appeared that neither the harbourmaster nor those on board vessel knew that the tide had begun to ebb, in which case it appeared t a vessel in order to get into dock should have come on in the channel, ich at low water was only from 30 to 40 yards wide, and been warped the harbour by lines. The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The duty of the harbou within the limits of his jurisdiction was defined by the 52d sectio Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847.* But neither tha nor the bye-laws of the harbour trustees, which proceeded upon put the harbourmaster into a position of responsibility for the na of the vessel. Upon the evidence in the case there was clearly on the part of those in charge of the navigation, no proper course been steered, nor other precautions taken in entering the harb these circumstances, there was what amounted to contributory ne on the part of the master and his pilots, and, that being so, the could not recover.[1] The maritime rule that where damage resul the fault of both pursuers and defenders the loss was equally applied solely in collision cases.[2] schooner, and that his order to 'Come on' merely meant that the schoon not drop anchor, but proceed, leaving it to those on board to look after t she was to follow, and that, if she took a course which led her agrou must bear the consequences themselves. I was rather disposed at first this view, but, on further consideration, I have come to a different co I quite agree that in ordinary circumstances a harbourmaster is not re for the navigation of any vessel entering his harbour. But, if, within diction, he issues orders for handling the vessel in a certain way, with of bringing her into dock, or into a certain berth in the dock—orders v vessel is bound to obey—then I think he and his employers are respon the consequences which follow from obedience to his orders. Now harbourmaster order the schooner to port her helm? . . . I am in think that the harbourmaster ordered, either by word or by signalling, known to and understood by nautical men, that the schooner should ' on a port helm. If he did, then he did what was wrong, and, by his to the grounding of the schooner, and the consequent damage. . .

"Another point against the harbourmaster is this,—he saw w schooner was, and where she was going. He could have ordered he anchor instead of ordering her to 'come on,' and if he had done so soo he did, no accident would have happened. He did not, however, schooner to anchor in the river; he intended to bring her into do order he gave to anchor was given with the view of warping the scho dock from that point. His order to anchor, however, was delayed and the obvious reason of this is, that he did not know until after the took the ground that the tide was ebbing. If he had known that, I b would have given the order to anchor before the schooner had got so pier-head.

"The result I have reached on the whole case (but not without son tion and difficulty, for my first impression was rather in favour of the de is, that the schooner being within the jurisdiction of the harbour au the harbourmaster gave orders to the schooner which she was bound that the orders were wrong, and that obedience to them was the cau schooner grounding."

* The Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847 (10 Vict. c. 27) enacted;—"The harbourmaster may give directions for all or any of th ing purposes (that is to say), for regulating the time at which, and the in which any vessel shall enter into, go out of, or lie in or at the harbou or pier, and within the prescribed limits, if any, and its position, mo unmooring, placing and removing, whilst therein."

put upon the port helm, the primary cause of the accident. The master was bound to obey the orders of the harbourmaster even although these orders were injudicious.[1] The bye-laws of the harbour trustees were very distinct as to the duty of those on board ship to obey the harbourmaster.[2]

But on the assumption that those in charge of the ship were also at fault, the Admiralty rule applied, and the loss must be equally divided.[3] Further, although the pursuer might have been guilty of negligence contributing to the accident, yet if the defenders could by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence have avoided the accident, the pursuer's negligence would not excuse them.[3]

LORD PRESIDENT.—I entirely agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that the harbourmaster was in fault, and that that fault conduced to the stranding of the vessel. His Lordship says,—"The harbourmaster saw where the schooner was, and where she was going. He could have ordered her to drop anchor instead of ordering her to 'come on,' and if he had done so sooner than he did, no accident would have happened. He did not, however, mean the schooner to anchor in the river; he intended to bring her into dock. The order he gave to anchor was given with the view of warping the schooner into dock from that point. His order to anchor, however, was delayed too long, and the obvious reason of this is, that he did not know until after the schooner took the ground that the tide was ebbing. If he had known that, I believe he would have given the order to anchor before the schooner had got so near the pier-head." That certainly shews great fault on the part of the harbourmaster, because, above all things the duty of that official is to direct where a ship ought to anchor. It is indispensable that he should know what the state of the tide is, and yet it is made very plain upon the evidence that he did not know that it was ebbing, and, accordingly, he could not be in a position properly to direct the course of the vessel.

I may observe at the same time that I do not think that a harbourmaster is directly responsible for the navigation of a vessel. That was in the hands of the master and pilots whom he had taken on board, who were certainly not pilots in a very high sense of the term, but nevertheless were acquainted with the navigation of the river. The navigation of the vessel remained in their hands, but it was for the harbourmaster to say whether she should go into the harbour, or go into a part of the river from which she could be warped to the dock, or whether she should cast anchor, and in adopting the third of these alternatives, and rejecting the second, the harbourmaster, I think, was cl fault, as the Lord Ordinary has found.

But then there remains a very serious question, how far the injury the vessel by her being stranded was caused also by the contributor gence of those in charge of her navigation, and there I am disposed on th to differ from the Lord Ordinary. Indeed, I hardly think his Lordsh applied his mind to a consideration of that question, as I do not see that course of his note he has suggested whether there was or was not contr negligence, or given any opinion upon that point. Looking to the evid have come to the conclusion that there was contributory negligence, and the evidence is very strong. There are several witnesses to whom I m who give very important evidence regarding the ignorance which see mistake which was committed in the navigation of the vessel by porti fault of the harbourmaster, but it shews, I think, very plainly that the the harbourmaster was not the sole cause of the misfortune, and that the improper navigation in porting the helm the accident would no occurred. The necessary consequence is that the mistake in navigation part of the master of the vessel and his assistants, who were pilots, was conducive to the injury done to the vessel, or rather to her stranding.

The conclusion accordingly at which I arrive is, that there was clear f the part of the harbourmaster on the grounds set forth by the Lord Or

But, even if the A so limited, the authority of Guthrie's case and the present case w affected, for the truster here, in using the terms "moveable" and able," was invoking the law of intestate succession, the only succession law in which these terms had any meaning. The fourth and other parties interested in the heritable estate —The dicta in Hare's case were very plain, and the point was ob considered, for Lord Shand, who differed from the rest of the Court, it expressly, and took a different view from that of the majority statute must be read as if there had been a clause saving its opera cases of testate succession.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The question before us in this special case is two sums of money fall to be disposed of under one or the other of t poses of the will of the testator. The third and fourth purposes of t relate, the one to what is to be done with the "moveable" estate, the what is to be done with the "heritable" estate of the deceased. The qu whether the sums of money are heritable or moveable.

That question seems to be very much the same as was before the Cou case of Guthrie (1880, 8 R. 34), and any difficulty we felt in the pres arose from the case of Hare (1889, 17 R. 105), in which it was said t clause of the Act of 1868, which makes heritable bonds moveable, relat to cases of intestate succession.

But it appears to me that the provision of the Act to which I have r although it may only refer to cases of intestate succession, puts the dire a person who gives a general direction as to what is to be done with her able" and "moveable" estate, in the same position as if she had provid the law—i.e., the Act of Parliament—should determine what the mea these general terms should be. That being so, I come to the conclusi these sums are to be disposed of under the third, and not under the four pose of the trust.

Dec. 19, 1890. Hughes' Trustees v. Corsane.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—The truster disposed of her moveable estate in favour of certain legatees, and we have now to determine whether a bond of annuity and two bonds and dispositions in security are included in that estate, or are to be considered as heritable estate. I am of opinion that they are moveable.

What is moveable estate and what is heritable estate can only be settled by the law. There is no other standard. For in disposing of her moveable estate, the truster disposes of that part of her estate which in the eye of the law is moveable, or in other words, of that part of her estate which would by law descend to her executors and not to her heir.

It is admitted that the bond of annuity and bonds and dispositions in security by force of the recent statute would descend to executors. They are therefore moveable estate, and must pass to the legatees of the moveable estate. In determining this question we must refer to the whole law as it stands at the death of the truster—whether common law or statutory—and not to a part of it.

The only difficulty which I have felt was from the recent decision in the case Hare. But I have conferred with the Judges who took part in that decision, and they are satisfied that our present judgment does not in any way conflict with it. Of course the right of succession in testacy is settled by the will of the testator, and not by the statute. But the statute must not the less be taken into account in determining what is moveable and what is heritable.

THE COURT answered the first question in the affirmative.

LADY MARY LEITH OR MILLER AND OTHERS (Sir William Miller's Trustees), First Parties.—Johnston—Macfarlane—Pitman. JOHN ALEXANDER MILLER, Second Party.—Sol.-Gen. Pearson—G. W. Burnet.

Succession—Trust—Directions to trustees to manage estate, after it had vested in beneficiary, until beneficiary attained twenty-five years of age—Repugnancy.—A testator directed his trustees to hold and manage, "as absolute proprietors," certain heritable property for behoof of his second son until the latter attained the age of twenty-five, when they were to denude in his favour, declaring that the property should not vest in him till he attained the age of twenty-five, or married with the consent of the trustees after attaining the age of twenty-one.

The testator also directed his trustees to hold the whole residue of his moveable estate in certain shares for his children. The vesting clause was in similar terms to the vesting clause regarding the heritage, but there was no similar direction as to management. The trustees were, however, given an unlimited discretion as to the application of the annual interest of the shares of residue, and it was declared that on the sons' attaining the age of twenty-five, and the daughters attaining that age or being married, they were to be entitled absolutely to any accumulations of interest on their respective shares, and the trustees were directed to pay over the same to them accordingly.

The son, after attaining the age of twenty-one, but before attaining the age of twenty-five, married, with the approval of the trustees.

Held by a majority of seven Judges (diss. Lord Young and Lord Trayner) that the son's right to the heritage and to his share of the moveable estate having vested in him upon his marriage with the consent of the trustees, he became then entitled to call upon the trustees to denude in his favour.

Lord Young and Lord Trayner were of opinion that the direction to the trustees to hold and to manage until the son attained twenty-five years of age (which

2D DIVISION, with three consulted Judges. M.

SIR WILLIAM MILLER, of Manderston, Bart., died on 10th Oct survived by his widow and by four children, of whom the se John Alexander Miller.

Sir William left a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 6th 1876.

In the second purpose of the deed he directed his trustees his wife, Dame Mary Leith or Miller, the free liferent use, oc and enjoyment of, inter alia, his house No. 1 Park Lane, Londo mansion-house of Manderston, Berwickshire, until his eldest son, it was destined in the fifth purpose, should attain the age of tw and also of the dwelling-house on the estate of Barneyhill, Ha shire. The deed further provided,—"Quarto. Subject to the life vision in favour of my said wife secundo before written, I d said trustees to hold my lands and estate of Barneyhill, and t other lands and heritable or real estate of every description within the shire or county of East Lothian, with the whole books, and household plenishing of every description in the house of Barneyhill, for behoof of my second son, John A Miller, and the heirs of his body in fee; whom failing, . Quinto, My said trustees shall manage, as absolute proprietors, estates in Berwickshire, and house in London, and estates Lothian, for the party entitled thereto under these presents, u party attains the age of twenty-five years,—my said trustees, s the before-written provision in favour of my said wife, allow party such occupation of the whole or any part thereof as they sider best; and upon said events happening, my said truste denude of said lands and estates in favour of the party to whom are respectively destined: . . . And I hereby declare that n my said several lands and estates shall vest in such of my chi may be entitled thereto under these presents until he or she at age of twenty-five years, or is married after attaining twenty-o of age, with the consent and approbation of my said trustees, w event shall first happen: . . . Septimo, My said trustees sh the whole residue and remainder of my moveable or personal m estate for behoof of my whole children, including the heirs who to my heritable and real estates, in the following shares or pro viz.:—Nine-twentieths for my eldest son, seven-twentieths for m son, and two-twentieths for each of my daughters: . . . said trustees shall have unlimited discretion in the applicatio annual interest or proceeds of the share of residue to which ea children may be entitled in fee or in liferent, and shall apply s thereof as they may deem necessary and proper for the mai clothing, education, upbringing, and advantage of the said childre tively: . . . rustees shall pay and make over the same to them accordingly: And hereby specially declared that the provisions out of residue, hereby ived in favour of my sons, shall not vest in them until they attain ge of twenty-five years, or marry after attaining twenty-one years of with the consent and approbation of my said trustees, whichever shall first happen."

was dissatisfied with the allowance made to him by his father's ees, and maintained that having married after attaining the age of ty-one years with the consent and approbation of the trustees, he was led to a conveyance in his favour of the lands and estate of Barney- nder burden of the liferent in favour of his mother, and also to have eyed to him his seven-twentieths share of the residue, with the mulations thereof.

e trustees, on the other hand, maintained that they were bound by erms of Sir William's trust-settlement,—notwithstanding John Alex- r Miller's marriage with their consent after twenty-one,—to continue anage the heritable estate, and to hold his share of the residue until ttained the age of twenty-five.

special case was accordingly presented to the Court by (1) Sir Wil- 's trustees, and (2) by John Alexander Miller.

he questions of law for the opinion of the Court were,—"(1) Whether, he circumstances above set forth, the parties of the first part are bound nce to convey to the party of the second part, subject to the liferent vision in favour of his mother, Lady Miller, the lands and estates of neyhill, or whether they are bound to retain and manage them until attains the age of twenty-five years? (2) Whether, in the circumstances ve set forth, the parties of the first part are bound at once to make ment to the second party of his seven-twentieths of the residue of Sir liam Miller's personal estate, or whether they are bound to hold the e, applying the annual income thereof as directed by Sir William ler until the second party attains the age of twenty-five years?"

n 29th October 1890 the Second Division, after hearing counsel, ointed the case to be argued before them and three Judges of the First ision.

rgued for the first parties;—(1) Upon a sound construction of the l, the truster's intention was that his trustees should hold and manage estate of Barneyhill for behoof of the second party until he attained age of twenty-five, and that notwithstanding it had vested in him re that period by his marriage after twenty-one, with their consent. regarded his moveable estate, his intention was to the same effect, ugh not express, as in the case of the Barneyhill estate, his intention to be implied from the general terms of the deed, and especially from clause in the seventh purpose as to holding accumulations of income l the second party attained the age of twenty-five. That clause ially distinguished between sons, whose accumulations of income were e handed over to them at twenty-five, and daughters, whose accumu- ns of income were to be handed over to them at the age of twenty- or at marriage, i.e., at the term of vesting. (2) The next question whether the truster had the power to attach such a condition to an lute gift. By the law of England it was true that a testator could make an absolute gift of the beneficial interest in an estate, and at the same time withhold from the beneficiary, or postpone his full enjoy ment of it,[1] but the English authorities on the point shewed that the Cour had proceeded upon the view that at the age of twenty-one the beneficiar had power to charge, sell, or assign his vested interest, and that powe was regarded as necessarily involving a right in the beneficiary to imme diate payment. Such a condition or restriction was not, however, illeg by the law of Scotland, and the Courts would give effect to it if otherwis the intention of the truster would be defeated.[2] It was a wise and reason able provision in the interests of the second party that he should not hav the management of heritable and moveable estate of such value until h had acquired greater experience than he would be likely to have at th age of twenty-one. The postponement of the right of management di not prevent his settling it by marriage-contract. There was no repugnanc between the gift and the condition attached to it, the retention by th trustees for the purpose of management being merely for a limited tim Moreover, the trust required to be kept up for other purposes. In th cases of Archibald's Trustees and Brown,[3] where the Court had refused t give effect to a direction by a testator postponing the enjoyment of a veste interest, it was to be remarked that the reason for the postponement pr sent to the truster's mind was not personal to the legatees, and had flow off, and with it the need for further postponement.

Argued for the second party;—As regarded Barneyhill, the testato had clearly provided that the estate should vest in the second party o his marriage after twenty-one with consent of the trustees. The dire tions as to holding and managing this estate were not in conflict wi and did not supersede the express provision as to vesting. Though n clearly expressed, it was evidently the truster's intention that the manag ment of the trustees should terminate simultaneously with vestin whether that took place at twenty-five or on marriage after twenty-on As regarded the residue, the provision as to vesting was the same. The was, however, no express direction as to holding or managing, and nothi to shew, even by implication, that the testator had contemplated or i tended that the management of the personal estate should be retained b the trustees after it had vested in the beneficiary. Assuming, howeve that there was a direction applicable both to the heritable and moveab estate to manage until the beneficiary attained twenty-five, it was ve from repugnancy. Vesting had taken place as regarded both portions the estate, and it was quite settled that where, by the operation of a te tamentary trust, a person had become vested in an absolute fee, he cou not be restricted in the enjoyment of it, unless there were other ulterior trust purposes to be served which necessitated the retention the estate in the hands of the trustees.[4] Here there were no such pu poses. Christie's[5] case was very special, and ought not to be follow

Miller's Trustees v. Miller.

The direction that the trustees should hold the estate and residue till the second party attained twenty-five was as repugnant to the right of fee vested in him as would be a direction to hold till he attained the age of 100, or until his death.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—There is, in my opinion, a general rule, the result of a comparison of a long series of decisions of this Court, that where by the operation of a testamentary instrument the fee of an estate or parts of an estate, whether heritable or moveable, has vested in a beneficiary, the Court will always, if possible, relieve him of any trust management that is cumbrous, unnecessary, or expensive. Where there are trust purposes to be served which cannot be secured without the retention of the vested estate or interest of the beneficiary in the hands of the trustees, the rule cannot be applied, and the right of the beneficiary must be subordinated to the will of the testator. But I am not aware of any case in which the mere maintenance of a trust management without any ulterior object or purpose has been held to be a trust purpose in the sense in which I have used that term. In this case the testator has directed his trustees to hold the estate of Barneyhill for behoof of his second son John Alexander and a series of heirs substituted to him, subject to a liferent use of the mansion-house in favour of his widow. The trustees are to manage the estate as absolute proprietors till the party entitled attain the age of twenty-five. But the testator further declares that no part of the estate shall vest in the party entitled thereto until he attain the age of twenty-five, or be married after attaining the age of twenty-one with the consent and approbation of the trustees, "whichever event shall first happen." This declaration though expressed in a negative form is a negative-pregnant, and involves a corresponding affirmative that the estate shall vest on the beneficiary either attaining twenty-five years of age or being married after twenty-one with the consent of the trustees. Marriage with consent after twenty-one (the event which has happened) is thus made precisely equivalent in its effect to attaining the age of twenty-five. But on the heir attaining the age of twenty-five the trustees are expressly directed to provide in his favour. I am of opinion that the same effect must follow the equivalent event of the heir marrying after twenty-one with the consent of the trustees.

The same considerations, I apprehend, must regulate the question regarding the disposal of the second son's share of the residue of the moveable estate, the declaration as to vesting being expressed in terms identical with those of the corresponding declaration regarding the heritable estate destined to the second son.

I am therefore for answering in the affirmative the first alternative of each of the questions submitted to us in the special case.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I entirely concur in your Lordship's opinion.

LORD YOUNG.—I have listened with all attention to your Lordship's judgment, and I am not sure whether the conclusion at which your Lordship has arrived is put upon the construction of this will according to the testator's intention, or whether it is put upon the ground that the testator's intention, about which there is no doubt, is such as the law will not give effect to. If the judgment is put upon the former ground, the question is one of no interest or importance whatever except to the parties in this case, and of very them, because it is a mere question of the construction of this particu which is a very long instrument, and certainly not taken from the styl and may never occur again. I may say for my own part that I would suggested the idea of sending a question of the mere construction of and the intention which is to be imputed to the testator in the constr it, to be argued before seven Judges as a question of difficulty and ance.

If, however, the judgment is put upon the other ground, viz., that t tion of the testator that his trustees shall hold and manage property right to it is vested in the beneficiary, is an intention which cannot by of Scotland be accomplished, then I consider that we are discussing a of first-rate importance.

I think it was hardly argued to us—I did not so understand it—wit to the heritable estate—the estate of Barneyhill—that the truster's was doubtful, that after the estate had vested in the beneficiary to had designed it, the trustees should nevertheless hold it and manage they were absolute proprietors, although for this son, until he attaine of twenty-five. That his marriage after he attained the age of twenty the consent of his trustees was equivalent in the truster's opinion to reaching the age of twenty-five is an idea which I do not think was in argument, and certainly did not occur to my mind.

The question of construction upon the will which was argued before a very important question—is, whether the language taken throughou sufficiently the intention so that we shall judicially act upon it, that tees are to retain and manage the personal estate in the same way as able estate, for, as was pointed out (and quite truly), while the int express with respect to the landed estate it is not so with respect to m but only to be implied. The contest between the parties was, whet were just and sufficient grounds for implying it or not, and that is a qu construction. Whether that was an intention the law would give ef whether it should be disregarded upon the ground of repugnancy (for no other), was the important and difficult question which we of the Sec sion, before whom the case came, thought so important and difficult opinion of seven Judges should be taken upon it.

Now, I shall deal with it accordingly, because it would be unfortu this discussion which we have had should terminate in a conclusion th the testator had no such intention at all, and that no question of impo difficulty arises upon the assumption that he had none.

I shall endeavour to point out, in the first place, that that is the int the testator, not to be implied, but expressed in as clear language as I could have used. And then I shall consider the question, whether u assumption it is an intention which the law will give effect to, or o the law will deny effect to, on the only ground that we were asked effect to it, namely, that it was repugnant to something else which done.

Now, it is the fifth purpose of the trust which we are interested i begin by pointing out that the estate which is the subject of that fifth was conveyed by the testator to his trustees on a complete legal title. conveyed to them, and they are infeft in that estate at this moment as pr here is the trust purpose we are now interested in with reference to te of which they are the proprietors with a complete legal title—"Quarto, to the liferent provision in favour of my said wife, secundo before I direct my said trustees to hold my lands and estate of Barneyhill" Lothian, with pictures, and so on, "for behoof of my second son John er Miller, and the heirs of his body in fee, whom failing," &c.

that is plain enough. They are to hold. There is nothing here about and there is nothing about withholding the conveyance; but then he Quinto, My said trustees shall manage, as absolute proprietors, my said n Berwickshire, and house in London, and estates in East Lothian" Barneyhill), "for the party entitled thereto under these presents until ty attains the age of twenty-five years." Now, who is "the party thereto under these presents"? It is, as it happens, John Miller. He is father's death apparently about twenty. He is said to be twenty- w, and his father has been dead for three years. He might have been ore his father died, and who would have been "the party entitled thereto ese presents" in that case? The heir of his body—a baby in the cradle have been. He would have been "the party entitled thereto under esents." Now, I read the direction again,—"The trustees shall manage, ite proprietors," that estate "for the party entitled thereto under these until said party attains the age of twenty-five years." Is that a lawful or is it not? If it is a lawful direction it must be given effect to. I case of John Miller being dead, and his heir a child, "the party entitled nder these presents." The right of that child is "by these presents." tees to whom the property title was given are directed to hold until he is ve. Is that bad? I have never heard a suggestion of a reason for that bad. It is said to be repugnant. Repugnant to what? to pro- that a man shall give to his son or his grandson an estate through the of trustees who are directed to hold it till he attains the age of twenty- heard it suggested, and I thought it could hardly be suggested seriously, t is just as repugnant as if he had directed the trustees to hold it for the ry until he was fifty or a hundred. If it were a hundred, there might, I e repugnancy. I think that would possibly come within the application of nguage which your Lordship used. It would be a cumbrous, unnecessary, ensive trust, and I think the Court would very fittingly disregard it. But own part, I say that until this case occurred I had never before heard it d that a father might not give an estate to his son or to his grandson the medium of trustees, directing the trustees to hold and manage it until he was twenty-five years of age. Is there anything contrary to nse in that? anything cumbrous, unnecessary, or so absurdly expensive e Court will interfere with it and direct the trustees to pay no attention to rection of the trust? It occurs to a father who is settling his estate— l not be for my boy's own interest that he should have it before he is five. The property is not likely to be so well managed by a young man wenty-five as it will be after he has attained that age, and using my best our and judgment to do what is best for him, I direct it to be managed tees for him till he is twenty-five, and to be then handed over to him." void from repugnancy?

Dec. 19, 1890. Miller's Trustees v. Miller.

I think it was an idea early impressed on my mind—I can hardly tel came there—that the bountiful giver—the person giving an estate to an might prescribe the age—and twenty-five is the most common of all in prac which with respect to that estate the beneficiary should be held to com Is that contrary to the law of Scotland, or has it been suggested hithe that is contrary to the law of Scotland, or that it is void from repugna think it is a familiar idea, and that is what I should have read here. Th "come of age" are not technical words. What is meant by them is tha law of Scotland generally (unless there is something in the particular c person shall not have the full power of entering into contracts and of m without the aid of others until he is twenty-one. There are many ex to that, e.g., a young man going into business before he is twenty-one, might multiply illustrations, but it would be idle. Now, here this gi "Twenty-five is the age at which I wish my son to be put into posse my estate, and not before that." I think if the suggestion had been Sir William Miller that his son would be a first-rate manager of the with the approval of the trustees, he married a girl of eighteen, Sir would have expressed himself somewhat strongly.

Now, I want to know whether the thing is absolutely illegal, so that i be accomplished, or is the proposition merely this, that the right way t plish it has not been taken here? I think in a question of this inte importance we should declare in terms either that the thing is illegal, and that the law will not sanction it, and that there is no way in which it can b plished—or, that it may be accomplished, but that this deed is bungled end; and that some different course ought to have been taken—and then, it would be only fair to point out that course. The father wishes his son, be an infant in the cradle, or his grandson to have his estate, but not to be possession or management of it till he is twenty-five. Can that be done if it cannot be done by the mere giving it to trustees on a complete leg with explicit directions to that effect, point out how it can be done ot I must say that I am startled by the suggestion that that is illegal— father is entitled to have such an idea in his mind, and that the law will whatever he does in order to accomplish it. The vesting of the right coming into possession are totally different things. There is nothi common, as I have pointed out already, than for complete vesting to ta in the merest infant. But the withholding of possession is another mat gether. A father or any other person may have any of a variety of rea desiring that an estate shall not be put into the management of his son he desires to be the proprietor of it, until he is twenty-five.

In the case of Christie's Trustees, July 3, 1889, 16 R. 913, we decide mously, the Lord Justice-Clerk giving the leading judgment, that a direc a testator to his trustees not to convey an estate to his son who was con vested with the beneficial right and interest in it, but to retain it and it, was good and effectual. The direction was not limited to five years, an application to the Court to order the trustees to disregard the dire the testator to hold and manage the property, the Court refused to give a order to the trustees.

Now, there is no question here about creditors. We have nothing to creditors. This property may be subject to the debts of the beneficia suppose it is. We are saying nothing to the contrary, and the beneficia disregard his father's will, and disappoint all his father's expectations, and the expectations of all his friends, by getting involved in debts, and his property may be taken in payment of them. We are not concerned with that. What we are asked to do now is to order these trustees, at the instance of the son, to disregard his father's express directions, and instead of holding and managing the estate till he is twenty-five, to convey it at once and directly to him. Now, that is an order to the trustees at the instance of the beneficiary, the son, which I, for my part, will be no party to make, and which I must protest against. I think, and upon the same grounds that the Court unanimously proceeded upon in the case of Christie, that it is in the will of the bountiful giver to give the express direction he has given, and that the trustees to whom he has given the property title with these orders ought not to be directed by this Court to disregard them. The right of creditors is another matter altogether.

No. 66.

Dec. 19, 1890. Miller's Trustees v. Miller.

Now, I have endeavoured to point out that this direction is irrespective of the vesting, and that the clause about marriage after twenty-one with consent of the trustees affects the vesting only, but would have no more effect upon this direction to hold and manage with respect to John than mere birth would have had with respect to the son of John. I suppose that if John had predeceased the testator, leaving a son, the vesting would have taken place in that son a morte testatoris. I do not think that doubtful, but the direction to the trustees to hold in his behoof till he was twenty-five is irrespective of that vesting altogether. The clause which regulates the vesting is—"And I hereby declare that no part of my several lands and estates shall vest in such of my children as may be entitled thereto under these presents until he or she attains the age of twenty-five years." If John had died leaving a child there might have been a question whether this grandchild would have come in terms of this clause as one of "my children," and, in my present opinion, I think there would have been strong—irresistibly strong—grounds for holding that he did not, and that the declaration preventing vesting until he should have attained the age of twenty-five, or had married after twenty-one with consent of the trustees, had no application to such a child. Therefore there would be vesting—at all events I can put the case in arguing the question that there would be vesting a morte testatoris, and vesting in the infant a morte testatoris. Is the direction to the trustees to hold till he is twenty-five bad by the law of Scotland? I think it is not. Now, that disposes of the question so far as Barneyhill is concerned.

I think in the course of the argument I put the question whether the direction to hold and manage till the beneficiary reached the age of twenty-five was to be applied with respect to the residue. Upon that question, difficult as I say I think it, I have come to the conclusion that it is. I cannot read that will and resist the conclusion that that was the testator's intention. The will produced upon my mind the judicial conviction that that was the testator's intention, and it is very much more important, if it be, that it should be carried out with respect to the residue than with respect to Barneyhill. The residue of the estate—that is to say, the personal estate, this young man's share of which is worth on half a million—is invested in a variety of ways. The trustees are to realise it, they are to ingather it; and does it occur to anybody as irrational on the part of the father to think and to direct his trustees accordingly—"All that property will not be safe in the hands of a young man under twenty-five. I direct you therefore to manage it till he attains twenty-five, and not to hand i over before then"? And it is no more startling than to say no father or othe bountiful giver can by the law of Scotland do such a thing, any more than he ca tell them to hold it till the man is a hundred. I altogether dissent from tha I think it is foreign to the cases which are illustrative of the doctrine of repu nancy,—the familiar and typical illustration of which is where a man giv to another in property, money, or anything else, but on the condition that h shall not pay his debts with it, having the idea, I suppose, of a great auth and statesman, who thought that paying debts was just throwing away goo money. Well, the law would not allow that. There is repugnancy in tha and that is a typical case of repugnancy; but the notion that a direction trustees to manage a property till a son attains years of discretion comes withi the same rule of law to which that belongs—the same doctrine and princip of law to which that belongs—is, I think, contrary to good sense. I ha already, I think, sufficiently pointed out that he does not make these bene ciaries proprietors. They have not the trust-estate. The property is in th trustees, and all that they can call upon the trustees to do is to execute th trust with respect to it—that is to say, they are to execute the truster's dire tions in so far as they are lawful. If these are unlawful, of course they to be neglected. Whether they are unlawful or not is a question of difficul and importance at least—upon which we thought it expedient to take the jud ment of seven Judges.

I am for answering the question in conformity with these views which I ha stated.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am of the same opinion as your Lordship i the chair.

It is admitted that the fee is vested in Mr Miller. I hold that as th absolute owner he is entitled to require the trustees to denude in his favo and that any direction of the testator to the contrary cannot receive effect.

I do not think that the law allows of any restriction on the owner of absolute fee, and in my opinion the direction that the trustees shall manage th estate till Mr Miller reaches twenty-five is just as repugnant to the right of which is vested in him as a direction to manage the estate till he reaches an other age, or it might be till his death.

I may say that in the case of Christie I had very great doubt, and I assente to the decision only because I thought that there were special circumstanc connected with it which do not occur here.

LORD ADAM.—I concur with your Lordship in the chair, and with Lo Rutherfurd Clark.

LORD M'LAREN.—My opinion may be expressed very shortly.

Ever since I knew anything of the law of trusts I have considered it to be settled and indeed an elementary proposition that where trustees hold proper for a person in fee, that is a simple trust which the Court will execute b divesting the trustees at the suit of the person interested. It seems to me tha a beneficiary who has an estate in fee has by the very terms of the gift the sam right of divesting the trustees, and so putting an end to the trust, which th truster himself possessed, because under a gift in fee the grantee acquires all th ht in the property which the truster had to give. It seems to me to be no only an unsound proposition in law, but a logical impossibility, that a person should have an estate in fee, and that some other person should at the same time have the power of withholding it. This I understand to be a well-settled principle. It is laid down by writers of authority on the law of England, and I have never had any doubts about its being the law of Scotland, although in view of this case being sent to us for consideration, and of the difference of opinion expressed, I must admit that it is an undecided point.

There are only two exceptions, so far as I know, to the operation of this general rule, as I understand it, and these are founded upon civil disability—I mean the case of marriage and the case of minority or mental incapacity. The case of minority or mental incapacity is only an apparent exception, because the trustees are only possessors in the character of guardians of the estate of a beneficiary who is not in the position to manage the property for himself. The case of a married woman is a real exception, but it is impossible to read the opinions of the eminent Judges by whom the doctrine of "separate estate" was established without seeing that they regarded it as an exception constituted for reasons of policy to a rule which was otherwise clear and invariable. My opinion therefore is in accordance with that delivered by your Lordship in the chair.

LORD TRAYNER.—I concur in the result reached by Lord Young, and concur also in every one of the reasons which his Lordship has given for reaching the conclusion which he has expressed.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"In conformity with the opinion of the majority of the Judges present at the hearing, answer the first alternative of the first question, and also the first alternative of the second question in the affirmative: Find and declare accordingly, and decern."

BY disposition dated 16th, and recorded 17th March 1888, Archibald Bowie, a partner of Archibald Bowie & Sons, builders in Glasgow, disponed a property situated in West Scotland Street there in favour of John M'Callum, Haircraigs, Denny, and Robert Bowie, Crosslands, Baldernock. M'Callum and Robert Bowie were cautioners to the Clydesdale Bank for a cash-credit to Archibald Bowie, under a bond dated many years previously, and the disposition was by back-letter declared to be in security of this obligation.

direct you therefore to manage it till he attains twenty-five, and not to over before then"? And it is no more startling than to say no father bountiful giver can by the law of Scotland do such a thing, any more tha tell them to hold it till the man is a hundred. I altogether dissent fr I think it is foreign to the cases which are illustrative of the doctrine o nancy,—the familiar and typical illustration of which is where a m to another in property, money, or anything else, but on the condition shall not pay his debts with it, having the idea, I suppose, of a grea and statesman, who thought that paying debts was just throwing aw money. Well, the law would not allow that. There is repugnancy and that is a typical case of repugnancy; but the notion that a dir trustees to manage a property till a son attains years of discretion come the same rule of law to which that belongs—the same doctrine and of law to which that belongs—is, I think, contrary to good sense. already, I think, sufficiently pointed out that he does not make thes ciaries proprietors. They have not the trust-estate. The property i trustees, and all that they can call upon the trustees to do is to exe trust with respect to it—that is to say, they are to execute the truste tions in so far as they are lawful. If these are unlawful, of course to be neglected. Whether they are unlawful or not is a question of and importance at least—upon which we thought it expedient to take ment of seven Judges.

I am for answering the question in conformity with these views whic stated.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am of the same opinion as your Lor the chair.

It is admitted that the fee is vested in Mr Miller. I hold that absolute owner he is entitled to require the trustees to denude in his and that any direction of the testator to the contrary cannot receive effe

I do not think that the law allows of any restriction on the own absolute fee, and in my opinion the direction that the trustees shall ma estate till Mr Miller reaches twenty-five is just as repugnant to the rig which is vested in him as a direction to manage the estate till he rea other age, or it might be till his death.

I may say that in the case of Christie I had very great doubt, and I to the decision only because I thought that there were special circu connected with it which do not occur here.

LORD ADAM.—I concur with your Lordship in the chair, and wi Rutherfurd Clark.

LORD M'LAREN.—My opinion may be expressed very shortly.

Ever since I knew anything of the law of trusts I have considered it settled and indeed an elementary proposition that where trustees hold p for a person in fee, that is a simple trust which the Court will exe divesting the trustees at the suit of the person interested. It seems to a beneficiary who has an estate in fee has by the very terms of the gift t right of divesting the trustees, and so putting an end to the trust, wh truster himself possessed, because under a gift in fee the grantee acquires right in the property which the truster had to give. * "NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary thinks it proper to report this case, because the process of reduction is incidental to another process at present depending before the First Division.

"The latter process is an action of sequestration and sale instituted by the defenders in this action, Messrs M'Callum and Bowie, against the present pursuers, in the Sheriff Court of Paisley, to enforce payment of the rent of certain premises, forming part of the subjects conveyed in the disposition now under reduction. The pursuers pleaded in defence that Messrs M'Callum and Bowie were not the true owners of the property, that the premises occupied by them formed part of the sequestrated estate of Archibald Bowie & Sons, and that, in a question with the true owners, they were entitled to set off the claim for rent against a debt due to them before the date of the disposition in question. Judgment was given against them in the Sheriff Court. They appealed to the First Division, and proceedings in the appeal have been sisted until the present action should be disposed of, or brought before the Court.

"It is not disputed that the disposition in question is reducible, at the instance of a prior creditor, under the Act 1696, cap. 5. But it is said that it is not for the interest of the general creditors that it should be set aside, and that the pursuers have no separate interest to insist in the reduction. The trustee in the sequestration, who had declined to be a party to the summons of reduction, has now been sisted on his own motion as a defender, and adopts the defences stated for the original defenders, M'Callum and Bowie.

"If the plea of compensation is otherwise well founded, it would appear to the Lord Ordinary that the pursuers have a good title and sufficient interest to reduce the conveyance, so far at least as they are concerned, and so as to enable them to maintain that it must be treated as invalid for the purposes of the other action. The main question in controversy in the present case, therefore, depends upon the merits of the pursuers' case in the appeal before the First Division.

"The trustee alleges that, with the consent of the commissioners, he has sold his whole right and interest in the property in question, including all right and title competent to him to challenge or impugn the validity of the disposition, and it is argued that the pursuers' right to maintain the present action has been excluded by the sale. v. M'Callum.

On 4th July 1890 the Court allowed the trustee to withdraw fro process, and sisted Thomas Colledge as defender in his room, and die remitted to the Lord Ordinary to allow the parties a proof of averments.

In addition to the facts above set forth it appeared from the proc the property in question was very largely burdened with heritable The trustee deponed that he had not raised an action of reduction deed because he had no funds, and did not wish to incur expense he saw whether the property would realise anything. An arrang had been come to between him and the bondholders and M'Callu Robert Bowie by which the property was to be managed for the co good of all concerned, any surplus rents being consigned in ba joint names for behoof of the parties who should be found to have to them. Meantime the trustee did not abandon his right to b reduction of the deed. Under this arrangement the action for re been brought by the trustee in the names of M'Callum and Robert Matters had continued in this position until the trustee sold the as the estate to Colledge on 22d January 1890.

The Lord Ordinary, on 22d July 1890, having heard counsel o proof, of new reported the cause to the Inner-House.

Argued for the pursuers;—There was here a proper case of com tion between the rent due by them to the bankrupt estate and their as creditors against the estate. It did not signify that the rent w payable till after the sequestration. It was contracted previousl was a liquid debt.[1] In these circumstances they had an inter reduce the conveyance as it was in prejudice of their right of com tion. The pursuers were therefore creditors prior to the conveyanc were prejudiced by the conveyance, and accordingly they had a goo to reduce it under the Act 1696, c. 5.[2] Their title was not diced by the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act of 1856. Tha gave the trustee a title to reduce in the interests of the general of creditors, but that was a title quite distinct from the title of a creditor under the Act 1696, cap. 5, and the title of such a credito not affected by it. If the interests of a prior creditor were affect had a title to reduce even if the interests of the general body of cre should be prejudiced by the reduction. But in this case there w such question. The reduction could affect the heritable creditors The question was therefore one between one creditor and anothe fell within the case of Wright.[2] The defender Colledge had neithe nor interest to defend. The trustee's title to reduce was quite di from the pursuers' title, and the conveyance of his title therefore di operate as a conveyance of the pursuers' title. Further, the conve was pendente lite, and was therefore ineffectual in a question wit pursuers.

Argued for the defenders;—(1) The pursuers were not entitled to action had been intimated to the trustee. The latter avers upon record th general creditors have no interest in the reduction. The interest which undertaken to sell, therefore, is that of the pursuers'; and the argument is during the dependence of a litigation, the defender may destroy the pu title, by selling the subject-matter of the suit to a third person. It appe the Lord Ordinary that the pursuers' right cannot be in any way affect such a transaction."

compensation against the claim for rent. The rent was not due at the date of sequestration. When it fell due at Martinmas following the pursuers were bound to pay it to the persons then entitled to it.[1] (2) The pursuers had no title to reduce the deed. The Act of 1856 vested the right to challenge such deeds in the trustee, and took it from the individual creditors. Under the Act 1696, cap. 5, the right to challenge was competent to prior creditors only.[2] The Act of 1856 vested it in the trustee for behoof of the whole body of creditors. A reduction contrary to the interest of the whole body of creditors was therefore incompetent. Here the pursuers were seeking to obtain a reduction which was in their own interest only and contrary to the interest of the general body of creditors. Since the Act of 1856 there was no case in which an individual creditor had pursued an action of reduction under the Act 1696, cap. 5, after sequestration.[3] (3) The pursuers had no interest to pursue the reduction. The effect of the sale by the trustee to Colledge was that if reduction was obtained it would accrue to the benefit of Colledge, and not of the pursuers. That transaction was one which was within the powers of the trustee under the Bankruptcy Act, and it was carried out by him according to its provisions. (4) There was not sufficient evidence at the date of the deed, or within sixty days thereafter, of notour bankruptcy under the Act 1696, cap. 5.[4]

At advising,—

LORD KINNEAR.—There are two actions to be disposed of between the same parties. The first is an action of sequestration and sale in the Debts Recovery Sheriff Court of Renfrewshire at the instance of John M'Callum and Robert Bowie, as proprietors of certain subjects in the parish of Govan in that county, against James Brown & Company, as tenants of these subjects, in respect of their failure to pay the rent due at Martinmas 1888. Brown & Company pleaded in defence that the pursuers were not the proprietors of the subjects in question, that the true proprietors were Archibald Bowie & Sons, whose estates had been sequestrated, and that they (the defenders) were entitled to retain the rents to compensate a counter claim at their instance against the sequestrated estate. The Sheriff repelled the defences, and if the question were to be determined according to the state of the title as it stood when the action was brought, that was probably a sound judgment. But the case was appealed to this Court, and before the appeal had been heard, an action of reduction was raised by Brown & Company for the purpose of setting aside the title of M'Callum and Bowie. Proceedings in the appeal were sisted until the reduction should be disposed of, and we have therefore to consider the merits of this second action before we can dispose of the appeal.

The title on which the action of sequestration is based is a conveyance ex facie absolute by Archibald Bowie in favour of John M'Callum and Robert Bowie. But it is admitted that this absolute conveyance is qualified by a back-bond whereby the disponees acknowledge that it was in reality granted in security for repayment of whatever sum they might be required to pay as the granter's cautioners under a cash-credit bond for moneys advanced to h the Clydesdale Bank. The conveyance is therefore a mere security, a ground on which it is challenged is that it creates an illegal preference the Act 1696, cap. 5, as a voluntary conveyance granted within sixty d bankruptcy in farther security of a prior debt to the prejudice of th creditors of the granter. I do not think it doubtful that this objec well founded, and that the conveyance is reducible under the statute indeed, I do not see that this is seriously disputed by the defenders. minute of admission they admit, among other things, statements co in the 3d article of the condescendence. Now, that statement is tha said Archibald Bowie was at the date of the said disposition withi days of the registration thereof, and he still is, in a state of notour bank having been on 13th March 1888 charged under an extract registered pr the instance of James D. Thomson, timber-merchant, Grangemouth, da March 1888, and recorded in the Sheriff Court Books of Renfrewshi March 1888, and which charge expired on 19th March 1888, without p of the debt, and was followed by sequestration of the said Archibald estates under the Bankruptcy Statutes on 21st June 1888."

It is only necessary to add that the guarantee by the defenders to th had been granted many years ago, that there was a large balance due bank when the conveyance under reduction was granted, that the insolvency was perfectly well known both to himself and to his agen that the conveyance was granted for no other purpose but to give the ca a security for their claim of relief. That the conveyance was granted tarily there can be no question. The evidence shews that it was prep the bankrupt's agent, Mr Jackson, without any demand from the de and even without any previous communication with them. They ap have known nothing about the matter until they were presented by Mr with a security for which they had never asked. I have not been able to the evidence any satisfactory explanation of the reasons for granting this ance, and certainly I can find no ground in law upon which it can be su

But then the trustee in the sequestration, for reasons to which I shal immediately, has not attempted to reduce this security as an illegal pre and it is said that if he thinks fit to leave it standing, the pursuers as in creditors have no interest and no title to set it aside. Their interest a tors is clear enough, because the effect of an action of this kind is to the estate for distribution. But besides this interest, which they have mon with the other creditors, they have a special interest of their own aside a conveyance which, if it stands, will exclude their plea of retent in other words, will defeat a security which they claim to possess over the sequestrated estate. We cannot now determine the validity of their right to retain, because there may be other interests involved which represented in this process. But the grounds on which they maintai right are perfectly intelligible, and will probably be found to be valid effect of the reduction should be to bring back the property over wh illegal preference extends into the sequestrated estate so as to make the by virtue of the vesting clauses of the statute, the proper creditor in th for rents. Whether that will be so or not I do not say at present, reason I have stated. But it is enough for the purpose of this action t pursuers have a good interest to set aside an illegal preference, if it be in order that they may be enabled to maintain their security in the sequestration, even although we cannot now determine, as against the other creditors, that that security will be effectual.

If they have a sufficient interest, it can hardly, I think, be disputed that they have a good title under the Act of 1696, because it is admitted that they are prior creditors, and because the right of reduction conferred by the statute is not given to the general body, but to those prior creditors whose interests are prejudiced. But then it is said that although an individual creditor might have reduced under the Act of 1696, that right has now been transferred by the Bankruptcy Act of 1856 to the trustee in the sequestration, so that since that statute the trustee alone has a title to reduce, to the exclusion of the title of individual creditors in any circumstances. I think this an untenable construction of the statute. The 11th section enables the trustee to set aside any deed or alienation which is voidable by statute or at common law, for behoof of the whole body of creditors, although such deed or alienation could not previously have been set aside except for behoof of a limited class of creditors. But there is nothing in that enactment to deprive a particular creditor of any right which he may have possessed either at common law or by statute, independently of the Act of 1856. It may very well be that a single creditor, by reason of a security which he holds over part of the bankrupt's estate, may have an interest either adverse to the general body of creditors, or in which they do not participate; and in such a case the trustee may have no interest, and therefore no title to reduce for behoof of the general body. But then the trustee takes the estate for behoof of the general body, subject always to the securities which existed at the date of the sequestration; and it seems to me to follow that the creditors who hold such securities cannot be deprived of their right to make them effectual by setting aside any fraudulent or illegal preference which may stand in the way of their legal operation, merely because the statute has extended to the whole body of creditors the benefit of certain challenges, which were previously available only to a particular class. The pursuers' position is that they held a good legal security over a part of the bankrupts' estate, but they cannot make their security effectual because it is apparently excluded by a conveyance which they allege to be a fraudulent alienation to their prejudice. If the trustee had thought fit to reduce such a conveyance, he would have recovered the property, which has been wrongfully alienated, for the benefit of the whole body of creditors, but subject always to the preferable security. For a right of retention is a security in the sense of the statute; and the estate in the trustee's hands is subject to the security created by that right, just as clearly as it is subject to a preferable security created by disposition and infeftment. It follows that if the trustee does not think fit to take action the pursuers may reduce for their own benefit an illegal preference which stands in the way of their legal right.

But it is said that the trustee has resolved not to challenge the defenders' conveyance not merely because the general creditors have no interest, but because it would be against their interest to set it aside. And the argument is that the pursuers ought not to be allowed to reduce to the prejudice of the general body of creditors. Now, in the first place, I do not see that there is any party to this process who has any title to maintain the interest of the creditors. The trustee was sisted as a defender, but on his own motion he was allowed to withdraw, on the ground that in the course of the process he had sold the whole assets of the bankrupt estate to Mr Colledge, and had therefore no longer any interest in the matter, and on that statement Mr Colledge was sisted in his room. The of the trustee therefore is that the creditors have no interest in the this action, and will not be affected by it in any way; and I do not Mr Colledge can be heard to contradict that position, and so displace th upon which he was allowed to appear as a defender.

But then it is argued, as I understand the defenders' case, that the of the pursuers' title must be determined with reference to the circums which they brought this action, and that at that date the trustee oppos because he thought the proceedings which they instituted would be p to the creditors. It is true that the trustee appeared in the process and the defences of the disponees, M'Callum and Bowie. It appears to m doing so he placed himself in a somewhat singular position, becaus endeavouring to maintain an illegal preference; and I am unable to satisfactory explanation of his reason for taking that course. It is poss the heritable creditors might have an interest in resisting the reduction it is possible that they may lose some part of the rents by the exercis pursuers' alleged right of retention; and, on the other hand, they nothing by the reduction, because their securities are preferable bot defenders and to the trustee. But, if it was in their interest that th appeared as defender, he was going altogether beyond the scope of his d was no part of his duty to maintain an illegal preference, merely becaus security-holders have an indirect interest in keeping it up, in order another security, which ex hypothesi is perfectly just. The supposed in the heritable creditors must therefore, in my opinion, be disregarde there is nothing in the evidence to shew that the unsecured creditors wi judiced. The only difference which this action can make in the sequestra ceedings is, that the subjects will be freed from the burden of an illegal sec the benefit of all the creditors according to their several interests; and difference which, on that being done, the pursuers' claim will make is, t may obtain full payment of a part of their debt by the exercise of a retention, instead of merely ranking for a dividend. If the unsecured have such an interest in the rents as to make this of any importance it would seem to follow that they must have a corresponding interes subject which produces the rents, and in that case they would gain mor recovery of the subject itself than they would lose by the retention of t But we have no such statement as to the position of the estate as w required in order to ascertain exactly the manner in which creditors affected by this action. And it does not appear to me to be necessary should inquire further. It is sufficient that the pursuers' claim to ret receives effect in the sequestration, is preferable to the claims of u creditors. It follows that if they should lose anything by the claim be tained, that is a loss to which they must submit. They cannot defea preference by setting up against it a preference which the law disallows.

For the same reason the only other ground on which the defence i tained appears to me to be equally unfounded. It is said that the tru sold the whole assets of the estate, together with his title to reduce t veyance in question, to the defender Mr Colledge, and that the sale must effect under the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act. It is not explained reduction of a security will prejudice the purchaser. But it is unnece consider whether the purchaser will be prejudiced. His position is, t virtue of his purchase he has acquired a right from the trustee to support the conveyance against the pursuers' challenge; and this position is untenable for two reasons. In the first place, assuming that the trustee might assign his own title to reduce for the benefit of the general body of creditors, it is manifest that he could not assign the preferable right of an individual creditor. In the second place, if he could have sold to the pursuers' prejudice before the litigation began, he certainly could not do so after the action had been raised. Now, the process was intimated to the trustee in obedience to an interlocutor of the 17th of December, the sale was carried through on the 22d of January, and the trustee was sisted as a defender on the 1st of February, for the purpose apparently of maintaining that he had defeated the pursuers' title by selling the right which formed the subject of litigation during the course of the process. I remain of the opinion which I expressed in reporting the case, that the pursuers' title cannot be affected by such a transaction.

The result is that, in my opinion, the pursuers are entitled to decree in the action of reduction, to the effect of enabling them to maintain their plea of retention in the sequestration. The reduction destroys the title of Messrs M'Callum and Bowie to maintain the action in the Sheriff Court; and the Sheriff's interlocutor must therefore be recalled, and that action must be dismissed.

The LORD PRESIDENT, LORD ADAM, and LORD M'LAREN concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Find, declare, and decern in terms of the conclusions of the libel against the original defenders John M'Callum and Robert Bowie, and also against the compearing defender Thomas Colledge: Find the said defenders conjunctly and severally liable in expenses, and remit," &c.

Succession—Marriage-contract—Vesting—Conditio si sine liberis—Alimentary provision—Discharge.—In an antenuptial marriage-contract a wife conveyed a sum of £4000 to trustees for the purposes,—(2) That, in the event of the marriage being dissolved by the predecease of the wife, "leaving a child or children of the marriage," the trustees should pay the annual produce of the fund to her husband "during his life, for his liferent and alimentary use only," excluding creditors and assignees, and that after his death the capital should be paid over to the child or children of the marriage, to the sons on attaining majority and to the daughters on attaining majority or being married. In the event of the failure of children when the term of payment arrived the fee was to be subject to the disposal of the wife by will, with power to the trustees to convey or pay over the capital or fee of the estate at any time after the wife's death and the failure of issue, "on obtaining the consent and discharge of the surviving husband, the liferenter, and the beneficiaries under the wife's will." (3) In the event of the marriage being dissolved by the predecease of the husband, the wife was to enjoy an alimentary liferent of the £4000, and after her death the interest was to be applied for behoof of the children during their minority, and on their majority (or marriage in the case of daughters) the capital was to be paid over to them. It was further declared that if such child or children should all die before their mother, or although they should survive her, "should they all die before attaining n and without leaving issue of their own bodies," the capital was to be d of according to the wife's will, or, in the event of her leaving no wil given to her heirs and executors. It was further provided that the provi the children should not be payable or become vested interests until a death of the longest liver of the spouses and until the children majority.

The marriage was dissolved by the predecease of the wife, who was s by one son, and who left a will in which she made over all she possesse husband.

In an action by the husband and the son (who had no children) for p upon their joint discharge of the £4000, the trustees pleaded that th bound to uphold the trust for the protection of the alimentary liferen surviving husband as well as for the eventual interest of the possible the son.

Held (1) that the clause in the deed giving, in certain events, the power to pay over the capital on obtaining the husband's discharge of rent shewed that it was not intended that the trust should be kept up protection of his liferent; (2) (diss. Lord Adam and rev. judgment of Lo cairney) that the terms in which the provisions to children were expr the clause providing for the event of the husband's predecease, mak failure of children "without issue" a condition precedent to the wi affecting the capital in the event of her children surviving her and dyin the term of payment, shewed that the provisions to "children" in th providing for the event of the wife's predecease were limited to childre marriage, excluding their issue, and that in the event of the son dyin the term of vesting, whether he left or did not leave issue, the capita vest in the husband under his wife's will, and therefore that the capit ultimately vest either in the son or the father, and that they were en payment on their joint discharge.

The marriage which followed subsisted till 10th June 1862 when M Edwardes died, survived by her husband and by one child, Henry Frederi William Edwardes.

Mrs Edwardes left a will, executed at Alexandria on 17th April 18 by which she made over to her husband absolutely all she then possess or might thereafter possess, by any ways or means.

On 7th November 1889 an action was raised by Dr Edwardes and h son, Henry Frederick William Edwardes, against the trustees acting und the above marriage-contract, to have it declared that the pursuers had f and absolute right and title to the securities representing the sum £4000 settled by Mrs Edwardes in the marriage-contract, and to have t defenders ordained to transfer and pay to them the same, with the interes and dividends accrued, upon their joint discharge.

The pursuers averred that the pursuer H. F. W. Edwardes had no chi or issue living, that the pursuer Dr Edwardes was by virtue of his decea wife's will in right of everything belonging to her, and that they we therefore entitled to demand and to receive transfer and payment of t sum sued for.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The pursuers being the only persons havi a right or interest in the sums sued for, decree ought to be pronounced concluded for.

The defenders denied that the pursuers were the only persons interest in the sum sued for, and pleaded;—(1) On a sound construction of t marriage-contract, the term of payment has not yet arrived, and the acti is premature. (2) The trust subsists for the protection of the liferent the pursuer Henry Stapleton Edwardes, which is alimentary, and n assignable by him nor subject to his debts or deeds, and the pursuers a not entitled to discharge the liferent. (3) The pursuers holding no prese vested interest in the trust-estate, the discharge proposed to be grant would be insufficient and ineffectual.

On 6th June 1890 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) sustained the fi and third pleas in law for the defenders, and assoilzied them from t conclusions of the summons, and decerned.*

* "OPINION.—This is an interesting but a special case, and I do not think is ruled by any of the cases which were referred to. . . .

"The provisions of the trust, so far as they bear on the events which ha occurred, are these:—The trustees are directed (1) to pay to Mrs Edwardes t interest of her estate, exclusive of the jus mariti, and protected from the credit of herself and her husband. (2) The second purpose provides for the event the wife's predecease. It is provided that, if she shall predecease leaving a chi

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—The Lord Ordinary had held that the conditio si sine liberis applied to the deed in question, and that of the marriage, the trustees shall pay the interest of her estate to her husband during his life, for his alimentary use, and not attachable for his debts; and it is provided that the capital shall be paid to the child or children at the first term after their father's death and on majority, and if there are no children alive at the dissolution of the marriage, 'or though there should then exist a child or children of the marriage, in case of the death of all of them before the terms of payment of their provisions as aforesaid, the said interest or annual produce shall still be paid to the surviving husband during his life for his liferent and alimentary use as aforesaid,' but the capital shall be at the wife's disposal by will or writing, and the trustees, 'on the death of the surviving husband, shall be bound to pay the same to the disponees or assignees under any will or other writing which she may execute, and failing her executing any other such will or writing, then to her own nearest heirs and executors whomsoever.'

"There follows a power to the trustees to pay the capital at any time after the death of the predeceasing wife and the failure of issue on obtaining the consent and discharge of the surviving husband, the liferenter, and of the beneficiaries under the wife's will, or of her heirs and executors if she shall not leave a will.

"The third purpose of the trust provides for the event of the predecease of the husband. The provisions are similar to those in the second purpose, but although it is proper to consider them, still, the event to which they relate not having happened, it is not necessary to advert to them further.

"The deed confers certain powers to make advances, and proceeds to declare that, with the exception of the power last above given to encroach upon a portion of the capital of their shares, the foresaid provisions for the children of the marriage shall in no case be payable until the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the death of the longest liver of their father or mother, nor whether before or after that period, until they respectively attain the age of twenty-one years complete, 'nor shall these provisions become vested interests or be transmissible by them until after the death of the longest liver of their father and mother, and after their respectively attaining majority.'

"These are the main provisions of the marriage-contract so far as bearing on existing circumstances, and it appears to me that there can be no serious doubt (1) that under that deed the only right conferred on Dr Edwardes, the husband, is an alimentary liferent, and that the trustees are directed to hold the funds for that liferent; (2) that no right has vested in the younger pursuer, the son; and (3) that the trustees are absolutely prohibited from paying the estate to the son while the father is alive. In the case of Scott's Trustees v. Brown & Co., 19th May 1882, 9 R. 798, a very similar deed was submitted to the Court for construction, and it was held that there was no vesting in the children till after the death of both father and mother. But in the present case the unambiguous and express declaration of the truster as to vesting seems to foreclose any question on the point.

"Further, I think it cannot be doubted that the ordinary condition si sine liberis decesserit is implied in this deed—that is to say, that it contains an implied institution in favour of the issue of the younger pursuer if he shall die without himself acquiring a vested interest in the estate.

"Mrs Edwardes left a will, executed at Alexandria on 17th April 1860, by which she made over to her husband in case of her death, 'All I now possess and all I may hereafter possess, by any ways or means, or whatever moneys or other property may be left me by any relatives or friends, or money or moneys, property, personal property, ships or ship, my husband is to have the power of the whole in his hands, so that he may do what he likes with them, and make over them in his will to anyone he wishes.'

"This will makes no mention of the settled fund over which Mrs Edwardes had the power to test which has just been mentioned. But it was not, and I think, could not be disputed that the will carried the settled funds if Mrs

"In these circumstances it has been contended for the pursuers that the the whole jus exigendi in the funds in question, that if the father shall cease the son, the right will vest in the son, while if the father be the su the funds will be immediately payable to him under his wife's will, and th joint discharge will therefore completely exoner the trustees. "Had the circumstances in which under the marriage-contract Mrs Edw power to test on the settled funds was to arise occurred,—that is to sa there been no living issue of the marriage, I would have been inclined t that Dr Edwardes would have been entitled to demand the funds, and t trustees could not have resisted that demand on the ground that they were to hold in order to protect Dr Edwardes's alimentary liferent. I shoul come to that conclusion on account of the wide and absolute terms in Mrs Edwardes's will is conceived, and on account of the terms of the which has been referred to, and, if the provision as to that alimentary had been the trustees' sole ground of defence, I rather think I should hav that it could be overcome.

"But I have come to the conclusion that the other defences of the t ought to prevail. I think that in all the cases quoted for the pursuers trustees have been directed or authorised to denude on the joint applica a liferenter and of the person to whom the fee stood destined, the right fee was held to have vested, and that that has always been held to be esse such cases. In the case of Latta v. Muirhead, 23d December 1887, 15 anticipation of the term of payment of the fee was authorised, only becau fee was held to have vested. But that judgment has been overruled House of Lords, on the ground, I understand, that it was held that the f not vested. Here the fee has certainly not vested in the son, and althou view seems maintainable that a defeasible fee may have vested in the hu that appears to be very doubtful indeed, and would not in any view bri present case within the scope of the authorities quoted. The dilemma p the pursuers from which they concluded that the funds must certainly b view. There were only two cases[1] in which the conditio had been held applicable to marriage-contracts, and it was doubtful if the decisions in these cases could be now sustained. But apart from that, in clause 2, which was applicable to the event which had happened, viz., the wife's predecease, the only parties expressly entitled to the fee as institutes were "children." On the other hand, in the third clause, which dealt with the husband's predecease, there was an express reference to the "issue" of "children." The natural inference to be drawn from a contrast of the two clauses was that the absence of any mention of remoter issue in the former clause shewed an intention to exclude them in favour of any person whom the wife might nominate under her settlement.[2] In these circumstances, the pursuers were the only persons who could ever have right to the fund in question, and one or other of them must eventually take it. If the father predeceased the son, the son became absolute fiar as institute under the marriage-contract. If the son predeceased the father, the father took it as absolute fiar under his wife's will. Their joint discharge was then sufficient exoneration to the trustees. The case was in obvious contrast to the case of Latta v. Muirhead,[3] in which the ground of judgment in the House of Lords was that the pursuers in the case might eventually have turned out not to be the persons entitled to take the fee in terms of the deed. Perhaps the correct view was that the fee was in the father subject to defeasance in favour of the son. The fact that the father had an alimentary liferent was no bar to the trustees denuding. He might renounce or discharge it if he pleased. Moreover, the deed itself shewed that there was no intention to maintain the trust merely to secure this liferent, for there was a clause providing for the discharge of the liferent in the event of failure of children. The consent of the only surviving child might surely be taken as equivalent to his death or non-existence. Payment of the larger right of fee would discharge the lesser right of liferent.[4]

Argued for the defenders;—Under the deed the father had no right able to one or other of them, seems to overlook the consideration that the son may predecease the father, leaving issue, which issue would, I apprehend, take the fund and exclude the husband.—Fraser on Husband and Wife, vol. ii. 1379. Suppose that in this case the fee had not been destined to children but to grandchildren, it appears to me that the trustees would be bound to hold so long as the possibility of grandchildren existed. I do not see that a provision to a child with the special declaration that it shall not vest in the circumstances which have happened can make a difference if I am right in thinking that a conditional institution in favour of grandchildren is implied. No means were suggested by which, if the funds were paid to the pursuers, the eventual rights of the possible issue of the younger pursuer would be preserved, and they might be totally destroyed, contrary to what I hold to be the implied provision of the marriage-contract.

"On the whole, I am compelled to conclude that the pursuers have not established their right to payment, and that the trustees are in the right in their contention that they are entitled and bound to continue the trust."

except to an alimentary liferent. As regarded the fee, he only came in as a disponee under a deed dated five years later, the provisions of which were not to receive effect except in a set of circumstances which as a matter of fact had not arisen. It was quite intelligible that on the final termination of the marriage relations, and on the husband alone surviving without children of the marriage, there would no longer be the same interest or necessity to keep up the trust, but until that occurred the husband had right only to the alimentary liferent, and this he could not discharge.[1] As regarded the son, he could neither assign nor renounce his right, as it was declared not to be transmissible during his father's life time. Neither of the pursuers then had a vested interest in the fund nor could demand payment.[2] Further, neither of the pursuers might ever take a vested right in the fund, as there was an implied gift to the "issue" of children. The conditio si sine liberis was not excluded in the case of marriage-contracts,[3] nor was it excluded by the terms of the present deed. The word "children" in the 2d clause dealing with the event which had happened fell to be read as including "grandchildren." The reference in clause 3 to the failure of "issue" of "children," shewed that in the view of the contracting parties such issue had been already called by implication in the earlier provision to "children." If "children" included "grandchildren" in the later clause, why not in the clause dealing with the wife's predecease? The very fact that the issue of children were called in the one event suggested that they were meant to be called in the other.

Lord President.—The question depends on the construction and legal effect of the settlement of a sum of £4000 in the marriage-contract of the leading pursuer, Dr Edwardes, and his now deceased wife. The £4000 was part of the estate of Mrs Edwardes, and she conveyed the sum to the marriage trustees for the purposes—(1) to pay the interest to the wife during the subsistence of the marriage for her alimentary use; (2) on the dissolution of the marriage by the predecease of the wife, to pay the interest to the surviving husband for his alimentary use, excluding heirs and assignees; (3) on the death of the surviving husband, to pay over the capital to the child or children on the sons attaining majority, and the daughters attaining majority or being married; (4) on the failure of children when the term of payment arrives, the husband's alimentary liferent is to continue, and the fee is to be at the disposal of the wife by will, and, failing her executing a will, is to pass to her nearest heirs and executors.

The pursuers are the surviving husband and the only child of the marriage, Mr Henry Frederick William Edwardes, and their demand against the trustees as defenders, is that they shall pay over to the pursuers, on their joint discharge, the whole sums in their hands representing the original settled fund of £4000.

The defences substantially resolve themselves into two grounds of objection to the pursuers' demand.

In the first place, the defenders maintain that they are bound to uphold the trust for the protection of the alimentary liferent of the surviving husband, the leading pursuer. But the position of Dr Edwardes is peculiar. Mrs Edwardes who died in 1862, made a will on the 17th April 1860, leaving her whole estate to her husband absolutely. In these circumstances there can be no doubt that, if there was no surviving child of the marriage, the surviving husband would be entitled to demand an immediate conveyance of the fee, for the trustees are empowered to pay over the whole capital "at any time after the death of the predeceasing wife and the failure of issue, on obtaining the consent and discharge of the surviving husband, the liferenter, and the beneficiaries under the wife's will or settlement, or of her heirs and executors failing her executing a will." The only obstacle to the application of this clause is the existence of the other pursuer, Henry Frederick. But the clause just quoted shews that there was no intention to maintain the trust in all events merely for the security of the alimentary liferent, and if all parties interested—the surviving husband and the only child—are desirous to put an end to the trust and obtain a conveyance of the fee, it appears to me that the principle, if not the letter, of the clause is clearly applicable.

In the view of the case hitherto considered, the only parties who have any interest in the fund are the two pursuers. If the father predecease the son, the son becomes absolute fiar, as institute under the marriage-settlement. If the son predecease the father, then the father takes as absolute fiar under the wife's will, unless the son leaves issue, and that issue has right under the marriage-contract to take the fee as institute in place of his dead father.

This gives rise to the second defence pleaded by the trustees, that though the children of the marriage should all die before their shares become vested and payable, yet, if any of the deceasers leave issue, the issue will take in place of their parents; and that, as Henry Frederick may still marry and leave issue, the trustees are bound to hold in the prospect of such a contingency.

The decision of this question must depend on whether the term "children" in the clause applicable to the events which have occurred can be read as including "grandchildren." Confining my attention to the words of the clause itself, I should think the question one of some delicacy, but am disposed to construe the term strictly as not including grandchildren.

But any doubt as to this construction is, I think, removed by the light to be derived from another clause of the settlement, which provides for the event of the marriage being dissolved by the predecease of the husband. In that event the widow is to enjoy an alimentary liferent of the whole fund of £4000; after her death the interest is to be applied for behoof of the children during their minority, and on majority, or marriage in case of daughters, the capital is to be paid over to them. But this clause is followed by an important declaration "that if such child or children should all die before their mother, or, although they should survive her, should they all die before attaining majority, and without leaving issue of their own bodies," then the fund shall continue to be held by the trustees for the alimentary liferent of the widow, "but declaring, nevertheless, in the event of the said Mary Jane Naish surviving her said intended husband, and of the failure of issue of the said intended marriage," it shall be in the power of the widow to test on the capital.

The contrast between this and the clause applicable to the predecease of the wife is very remarkable. In the latter the only parties entitled to the fee as institutes are "children." In the former the grandchildren are conditionally instituted to their parents, and the widow's right to test is made dependent, not on the failure of children, but on the failure of issue of the marriage, a term of more elastic signification than children, and including descendants of any generation if the natural meaning is not controlled by the context.

Construing the deed as a whole, I am of opinion that the word "children" in the clause applicable to the event of the wife's predecease cannot be read to comprehend grandchildren or issue of children.

On both grounds of defence I feel myself obliged to differ from the Lord Ordinary, and to give judgment in favour of the pursuers.

I think it right to add that in disposing of this case I have not found it necessary to consider, and I have not considered, whether the conditio si sine liberis decesserit applies to a provision in a marriage-contract.

LORD ADAM.—This action is raised by Dr Edwardes and his only son against the trustees acting under the marriage-contract of Dr and Mrs Edwardes to have the sum of £4000, settled by Mrs Edwardes in the said contract of marriage with the interest accrued thereon, paid over to them.

The case is a peculiar one, because it is admitted that Dr Edwardes has no vested right in this fund, and it is equally admitted that his son has no vested right in it either. But the proposition is that, although neither of the pursuers has such a right separately, the two together can validly discharge it.

It is said that if the father survives the son the whole fee must vest in the father, and, on the other hand, if the son survives the father the whole fee necessarily vests in the son, and that, in any possible event, vesting must take place either in the father or in the son, and that although at present there is vested right in neither, by combining they can give an indefeasible discharge to the trustees.

The case, as I have said, is a peculiar one, and if the question only depended on the considerations to which I have referred, I could not say that the pursuers could not give a valid discharge to the trustees. But there is this further consideration,—Is it true on a construction of the marriage-contract that in every event vesting must take place in either the father or the son? The Lord Ordinary says not, because he says that the conditio si sine liberis applies. If that be so, the issue of children of the marriage are by the contract made conditional institutes, and in that case Dr Edwardes' son may predecease him, leaving issue who may survive Dr Edwardes and take a right to the settled fund. It therefore does not follow in that view of the contract that on his son's death Dr Edwardes could give a valid discharge to the trustees.

In the construction which your Lordship has put upon this contract, and which I understand is also adopted by Lord M'Laren and Lord Kinnear, it has not been necessary to decide whether the conditio si sine liberis decesserit would apply in the case of a deed of this kind. It appears to me to be a nice question and I have not made up my mind upon it, as the opinion which I am about to pronounce on the construction of the contract is not to be an operative judgment. I shall therefore only state the reasons why I differ from your Lordship on the construction of the marriage-contract, and I am not to be taken as saying that in all cases the conditio si sine liberis is applicable to marriage-contracts. Assuming, however, as I must assume, that in this matter marriage-contracts are in the same position as testamentary settlements, I think that in the second part of the second clause of the contract the issue of children are conditionally instituted.

The question turns principally upon the construction of this second clause

No. 68.
Dec. 19, 1890.
Edwardes v. Hughes.

In the first the trustees are directed to pay to the wife the interest of her estate during the subsistence of the marriage. In the second it is provided that if the wife predeceases her husband, leaving a child or children of the marriage, "the trustees shall pay the said free interest or annual produce to her said husband during his life for his liferent and alimentary use only, and with this declaration also, that the same shall not be assignable by him nor attachable for his debts or deeds; and the capital of the said sums and estate hereby conveyed shall be paid and made over to the said child or children at the first term after their father's death, and after their attaining majority in the case of sons, and in the case of daughters on their attaining majority or being married as aftermentioned; and if there are no children alive at the dissolution of the marriage by the wife's predecease, or though there should then exist a child or children of the marriage, in case of the death of all of them before the terms of payment of their provisions as aforesaid, the said interest or annual produce shall still be paid to the surviving husband during his life for his liferent and alimentary use as aforesaid; but the whole capital or fee shall be at and subject to the wife's disposal by will or other writing." Now, the wife has, in exercise of the power so given her, executed a will in favour of her husband—the pursuer, Dr Edwardes; and that, it is said, gives him the right which he claims in this action. It is quite clear, even from the terms of the clause I have read, that the son has no vested interest in the provisions to children, because payment of these provisions is made conditional on his surviving his father, but in another clause of the deed it is specially provided that the children shall have no vested right "until after the death of the longest liver of their father and mother." It is therefore quite clear on the construction of this part of the deed that the son has at present no vested right in the provisions in favour of children, and it is equally clear that although the husband may acquire the right to the settled fund under his wife's settlement he has no vested right as yet in that fund, and hence arises the question we have to decide.

Now, I think that where the clause directs that the capital of the estate shall be paid over to the child or children of the marriage the conditio si sine liberis applies, and that the meaning of the words used is the same as if the capital had been directed to be paid over "to children, whom failing, their issue"; and I do not understand that your Lordship would be of a different opinion except for the existence of another clause, which gives to the word "children" a more restricted meaning.

The clause to which your Lordship referred is the parallel clause to that which relates to the provisions made in the event of the wife's predecease, and deals with the event of the husband predeceasing his wife. It provides that in that event the widow shall have a liferent of the estate, and that "after her death the trustees shall pay or apply the whole future interest or annual produce thereof to or for behoof of the child or children of the marriage" during their minorities after their mother's death, and the capital of the shares of the said children in the said sum of £4000, and their mother's other means and estate foresaid, shall be payable to them after her death on their respectively reaching majority in the case of sons, or in the case of daughters on their attaining majority or being married. Had there been nothing more said it appears to me that this clause would have been framed in the same manner as the second clause, and I should have said that in this clause also the conditional institution of the issue of children was to be implied. So far as I can see, the two clauses are in entire harmony up to that point. But it is said that in the following lines tracting parties shew that in the second clause they are using the word "c in a limited sense, which excludes the application of the conditio si sin The deed in the third clause proceeds thus:—"Declaring always, that child or children should all die before their mother, or, although the survive her, should they all die before attaining majority and without issue of their own bodies," the mother may dispose of the estate by wil said that because there is a nomination of issue there, which implies the issue of the wife, therefore in construing the contract when the b "children" is used in the second clause we can only give it a restricted or, in other words, that where the parties mean to include the issue of they express themselves to that effect.

I should have felt the force of that observation if in the third clau the trustees are directed to pay over the capital to the children of the the words "whom failing, to issue" had been added—I should then the force of the observation that the word "children" standing alo second clause was meant to have only a limited meaning; but that seem to me to be the proper meaning of the words here used,—"But always, that if such child or children should all die before their m although they should survive her, should they all die before attaining and without leaving issue." It appears to me that the way in w language is used assumes a previous gift to the issue of children. I that that part of the clause necessarily proceeds on a supposition in t of the parties that in calling "children" they had called also the children. So it does not appear to me that the existence of the words leaving issue," in the place where they occur, has the effect of shew the parties, when they used the word "children" in the previous pa deed, necessarily meant to exclude the issue of children. It rath that the parties to the contract assumed that the issue of childre take under the general word "children," and then proceeded to provid event of the children dying and dying without issue.

That is my construction of the contract, and these are the reason differ from your Lordship. Though it will have no operative effec thought it right to state what my opinion on the construction of tract is.

Lord M'Laren.—I concur in the opinion of your Lordship as reg construction of the marriage-contract, in which you point out that ther a difference of phraseology in the two branches of the destination tha only conclude that, supposing the conditio si sine liberis were otherwi cable, it is excluded under this deed.

I quite appreciate the argument suggested by Lord Adam upon the question, that where a testator refers to the contingency of death witho it is to be taken as an implied gift to issue in the event of their surviv parents. That is a well-known rule of construction recognised in th England and Scotland in the construction of wills and settlements, and confined to cases of destinations to children, or to persons to whom the is in loco parentis. It does not appear to me that the existence of ought to influence the construction of the main question here, because struction founded on the words referring to death without issue must be to the branch of the deed in which the words occur, and is not to be referred to that branch of the destination in which children alone are mentioned without any reference to remoter issue.

In coming to this opinion I of course proceed on the assumption that the conditio is applicable, but it is an assumption made merely for the purpose of argument. It is a condition of the question of construction here raised. I desire to reserve my opinion as to the application of the conditio to a marriage-contract. I think this is a question which ought to receive further consideration when a case occurs properly raising it. There is no presumption that the parties to a marriage-contract intend to provide for any persons except those having legal claims upon them, and in such a case it can hardly be said that the conditional institution of grandchildren is within the scope of the deed.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordship. I cannot say that I should be able to come to the same conclusion if I thought that the right to the money settled under this contract had vested in neither of the pursuers. It appears to me, for the reasons stated by your Lordship, that the money belongs to one or other of them, though at present we cannot tell whether to the father or the son. That cannot be ascertained so long as they are both in life. But in the meantime, as both unite to demand payment, no difficulty arises from the impossibility of foreseeing in which of the two the right may ultimately be found to be vested.

The only difficulty I have felt in coming to that conclusion arises from the view which Lord Adam has explained, but I am unable, on consideration, to give to the words to which he referred the same effect as he ascribes to them. The view, as I understand it, is this—that in that part of the contract which deals with the event of the husband's predecease, the contracting parties have furnished a glossary for the construction of the word "children," by the aid of which it must be interpreted to include "grandchildren," both in that provision and in other parts of the deed.

I admit that there is a great deal of force in that argument as a criticism on the logical structure of the sentence, but I am not sure, even if I were construing that part of the contract alone without reference to any other part, that I could construe it in the same way as Lord Adam has done, because the language used is a very common form for making a conditional institution of the children of primary legatees, and it frequently occurs in the case of testamentary deeds where the provisions are in favour of strangers, or of children in such circumstances as make the conditio si sine liberis inapplicable. Accordingly, I am not sure that it is a sound construction of this part of the contract to say that where the framers of the instrument provide for the failure of children "without leaving issue of their own bodies," they must have had in their minds a distinct conception that the issue of children had previously been called by implication.

But if that were doubtful I think it would be quite impossible, according to the ordinary rules for the construction of written instruments, to disregard the difference between the provisions of the deed dealing with the event of the wife's predecease, and those dealing with the event of the husband's predecease; and I do not know that, even on the question of construction, it is immaterial to observe that this is not a will but a marriage-contract, in which the wife is settling funds on the children of the marriage, but is also stipulating for the right of disposing of these funds at her own pleasure in the event of there being no children. When the wife in making a settlement of this kind stipulates tha she shall be entitled to dispose of the funds by will, in one event if there are n children of the marriage, and in another event if there are no children or issu of children, I cannot, on the ordinary principles of construction, suppose th she does not intend to distinguish between the two cases. It is not necessa to speculate as to her reasons for making such a distinction. She has stipulat for an absolute right of disposal in the event of her predeceasing her husba and there being no children of the marriage, and it appears to me that the co trast between this clause and the later clause only goes to enforce the obligati of abiding by the literal interpretation of the words used in each.

On the question of construction, therefore, I agree with your Lordship, and also agree that it is unnecessary to determine the larger question whether t conditio si sine liberis can properly be applied to the construction of a marria contract in any case. But I desire to add that if the rule were applicable all, of which I am not satisfied, it appears to me to be very questionable wheth such a provision, if it should be held to include grandchildren, may not testamentary, and therefore revocable in so far as their interests are concern although it would certainly be pactional in so far as regards the immediate chil of the marriage.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, decerned terms of the conclusions of the summons, and appointed t expenses of both parties to be paid out of the trust-funds in hands of the defenders.

1ST DIVISION.
Dean of Guild of Glasgow.

A PETITION for a lining was presented in the Dean of Guild Court of the city of Glasgow by G. & G. Allan, builders, and others, proprietors of certain subjects situated on the west side of Armadale Street, and on the south side of Garthland Drive, Dennistoun, Glasgow. The petitioners proposed to erect upon their property certain buildings, the plans of which were duly lodged with the Dean of Guild.

On 4th October 1891, the Dean of Guild (Ure) appointed the petition to be served on the neighbouring proprietors, but none of these appeared to oppose the application.

On 28th October the Sub-Dean of Guild pronounced this interlocutor:—"In respect the petitioners have not the free space behind their proposed building required by the Glasgow Police Act (sections 367 and 370) to entitle them to occupy the room or kitchen marked A on said plans as a sleeping apartment, refuses the lining craved, reserving to the petitioners to renew their application when, by such alteration of their plans, the said free space shall be secured, or on their undertaking that the said room shall not be occupied as a sleeping apartment."

The petitioners appealed to the First Division.

The respondents objected to the competency of the appeal, and argued;—Under section 277 of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, it was provided that "every proceeding before the Dean of Guild in pursuance of this Act" shall be subject to the regulation that where a record is not made up the Dean's decision shall be final. The present application was a proceeding "in pursuance of this Act," and as no record had been made up the Dean's judgment was not subject to review.

The petitioners argued;—The phrase "proceedings in pursuance of this Act" merely referred to what were known as Guild offences, which were summarily dealt with without any record being made up, and were not appealable. A process of lining was a common law proceeding, and the Dean's jurisdiction as regarded it was expressly saved by section 273 of the Act, which also preserved the right of review of his sentences in the exercise of such jurisdiction.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This petition in the Dean of Guild Court does not bear to be brought under authority of any Act of Parliament. It is an ordinary lining, and that is a proceeding falling within the Dean of Guild's jurisdiction at

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

The Court repelled the objection to the competency of the app

It was admitted at the bar that although the appellants had their own ground the free space required by sections 367 and 37 Act to entitle them to occupy the room in question as a sleepi ment, there was nevertheless free space over ground belonging to a proprietor ex adverso of their tenement, which, added to the amou space upon their ground, gave more than the Act required.

Argued for the appellants;—The Dean of Guild must con circumstances of each case as he found them. At the present ti was ample free space in front of the appellants' tenement if the un ground belonging to the neighbouring proprietor was taken into There was nothing in the Act to shew that the Legislature cont that the free space should be solely on the ground of the applic lining. Indeed section 370 contemplated free space being which was not exclusively upon the applicant's property, but of the area occupied by "any turnpike road or public or private court."

Argued for the respondents;—If this application was granted would be to sanction as a sleeping apartment a room which migh in a few days unfitted for such a purpose by the neighbouring p building on his own ground. It was a strain on the Act to hol regulations had reference to free space belonging to some one o the applicant. Section 370 permitted free space over turnpike to be reckoned, because in such cases the space was of necessity g as free and unoccupied in the future.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Dean of Guild appears to have gone too for he has applied secs. 367 and 370 of the Glasgow Police Act to a c in its present state admits of no such application. The 367th sectio Act provides that the "Dean of Guild shall not grant warrant to ere any building unless or until he is satisfied that the plan and sections signed with reference to such warrant . . . make satisfactory with respect . . . that every apartment except those distinguish plan as not intended to be let or used for sleeping in is of such size one or more windows, with such free space in front of every window to be in conformity with the provisions hereinafter contained." This the 370th section, which provides—"Except as aftermentioned, it sh lawful for any proprietor to let, or for any person to take in lease, or suffer to be used for the purpose of sleeping in, any apartment, unless at least of its height is above the level of the turnpike road, or public street or court adjoining or near to it, and unless there be in front o one-third of every window in such apartment, including any turnpik public or private street or court, a free space equal to at least three-four height of the wall in which it is placed, measuring such space in a str from and at right angles to the plane of the window, and measuring such wall from the floor of the apartment to where the roof of the building rests upon such wall."

Now, in the plan lodged by the appellant he discloses frankly that he intends the apartment he is about to erect to be used as a sleeping apartment, and the question is whether there is anything in section 370 to prevent him in existing circumstances from using or letting it for that purpose. The provision that he is not to use the room as a sleeping apartment, "unless one-third at least of the height is above the level of the turnpike road or public or private street or court," is a most intelligible one, for every building must have an access to it from some public or private street or court, and the statute takes as the basis of measurement the level of the street or court, or whatever it is, from which access is had to the building. And again, the provision as to free space in front of at least one-third of every window is equally clear. The required free space may include any turnpike road or public or private street or court, but there is nothing about excluding any other free space.

The question therefore is, whether or not there is in the present case a free space such as is required by section 370, and I do not understand that to be in dispute as things at present stand. There is ground adjoining the apartment which is proposed to be erected which affords that requisite space, and even although it may be built upon, as has been argued, the fact remains that it is not built upon now, and there is no reason for supposing that it will be built upon in the immediate future. Therefore, in my opinion, the proprietor has a perfect right to use the proposed room as a sleeping apartment. Indeed, I cannot see how he could be prevented from doing so, unless it fell within the prohibition in the statute. The interlocutor of the Dean of Guild bears that,—"In respect the petitioner has not the free space behind his proposed building required by the Glasgow Police Act (sections 367 and 370) to entitle him to occupy the room or kitchen marked A on said plans as a sleeping apartment, refuses the lining craved. . . ." Now, I understood these words to mean that the petitioner has not as his own property, or has not the command in permanency of, the free space required, but that is not the provision of the statute. It only requires that at the time when the room is being used as a sleeping apartment it shall have a certain free space behind or adjoining it, and at the moment that free ground comes to be built upon, if it is ever built upon, then will arise the question whether there is sufficient free space. If there is not, it will be the duty of the Dean of Guild, on the application of the Procurator-fiscal, to prohibit its use as a sleeping apartment, but until that occurs, I do not see how the statute can be enforced.

The lining, as I understand it, is otherwise unobjectionable, for the Dean of Guild reserves "to the petitioner to renew his application when, by such alteration of his plans, the said free space shall be secured, or on his undertaking that the said room shall not be occupied as a sleeping apartment." Now, I do not think he was entitled to demand any undertaking under the circumstances that this should not be used as a sleeping apartment, and I therefore think that, unless there is some other objection against the lining, the interlocutor should be recalled. The statute makes matters very secure for the future, for the moment the requisite free space ceases to exist there may be a prohibition of this room as a sleeping apartment, a prohibition fenced with very severe penalties.

Dec. 20, 1890.
Allan v. Whyte.

LORD ADAM.—The only reason given by the Dean of Guild for refusing this lining is "that the petitioner has not the free space behind his proposed building required by the Glasgow Police Act (secs. 367 and 370), to entitle him to occupy the room or kitchen marked A on said plans as a sleeping apartment," and these words are in the circumstances intelligible only if "free space" means free space on the petitioner's own ground. But these are not the words of the Act. The obligation contained in the Act is that there shall be in front of each window a certain free space, but not necessarily on the builder's own ground, as is clear from the words "including any turnpike road or public or private street or court." That being so, and there being at present the necessary free space in front of this property, I see no ground for refusing this application for a lining.

It appears further that the construction which the Dean of Guild puts on the Act cannot be the correct one, for if the Act makes it indispensable that the free space shall be on the builder's own ground, the Dean of Guild has no power to dispense with that provision, and yet he reserves "to the petitioner to renew his application when, by such alteration of his plans, the said free space shall be secured, or on his undertaking that the said room shall not be occupied as a sleeping apartment." Well, suppose the erection is proceeded with on the faith of this undertaking, how is it to be enforced? I see no means of doing it, and the Dean of Guild would simply be passing the lining on the faith of an undertaking which might be disregarded next day. I am therefore of opinion that there being the requisite free space at present there is no reason for refusing this lining. The statute makes clear provision for the event of that free space not being preserved.

LORD M'LAREN.—The principle on which our judgment proceeds is, I think, in agreement with the terms of the 370th section of the Police Act, which relates to applications to the Dean of Guild Court at Glasgow.

The Dean of Guild in determining the question of air-space is to take account of property ex adverso of the windows, although not belonging to the proprietor of the new building. Provided that this is unoccupied space,—space on which no buildings are in course of erection, or are likely to be immediately erected,—the purpose contemplated by the statute is satisfied, and with reference to this purpose it is immaterial to whom the vacant ground belongs. I only add this observation, that if there were depending at the same time an application from the proprietor of the unoccupied ground for authority to build on this ground, or if it was brought to the knowledge of the Dean of Guild that it was in immediate contemplation to build on such ground, these are circumstances which would be taken into account in disposing of the application. It would certainly not be proper to grant a warrant for the use of an apartment as a sleeping place with the knowledge that the ground shewn on the plan as air-space was about to be built upon. But except in that somewhat exceptional case, I am of opinion with your Lordship that it would be a too strict construction of the statute to reject the plans on the ground that the sleeping apartments will not have the requisite air-space in front when in point of fact there is unoccupied ground belonging to a different proprietor ex adverso of the proposed tenement.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. The Dean of Guild has refused the lining, "in respect that the petitioners have not the free space behind their proposed building required by the Glasgow Police Act (secs. 367 and 370), but I understand it to be admitted that that statement is not strictly accurate except on a certain special construction of the Act, and that the petitioner has, as a matter of fact, at present sufficient free space to satisfy the statute. But it is said that he may be deprived of this by his neighbour building up to his march, and the Dean of Guild appears to base his refusal on this, that the free space is required by the statute to extend over the exclusive property of the builder. If that were so, the Dean of Guild would have no discretion in the matter, nor any power to dispense with this requirement such as is implied in the reservation in his interlocutor. If the Dean of Guild had reason to think that what is now free space would shortly be occupied by buildings, then a different question would arise, but one not touched by our judgment.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel for the parties on the merits of the appeal, recall the interlocutor of the Sub-Dean of Guild, dated 28th October 1890, and remit to the Dean of Guild to proceed with the lining."

Election Law—County Franchise—Service Franchise—Son working on father's farm with no contract of service—Representation of the People Act, 1884 (48 and 49 Vict. c. 3), sec. 3.—A son worked as a farm servant upon his father's farm but without any contract of service. He took his meals in family with his father and received from him what money he required from time to time. He had the exclusive use, rent free, of a room in a cottage on the farm which was occupied by his grandmother, who paid no rent for the house to the father.

Registration Appeal Court. Lord Kinnear. Lord Trayner. Lord Kincairney. Sheriff of Roxburgh, Berwick, and Selkirk. C.

IN the Registration Court for the county of Selkirk held at Selkirk on 7th October 1890, John Aitchison, farm servant, Helmburn, claimed to have his name entered upon the register of voters for the county of Selkirk as tenant of a house at Helmburn.

The franchise claimed by him was that known as the "service" franchise conferred by the 3d section of Representation of the People Act, 1884.†

The claimant's father was tenant of the farm of Helmburn and resided in a cottage there. At a short distance from the father's house, and on the farm, there was a cottage occupied by the claimant's grandmother, who, however, paid no rent to the father for the house. The claimant had the exclusive use of a room in that house. The claimant worked on his father's farm as a member of the family, and not under any definite contract of service for wages or other remuneration. He took his meals in family with his father and received from his father what money he required from time to time. He deponed that he had occupied the room in the cottage for the last four or five years, and that he was to have the exclusive use of it so long as he worked on the farm, but that he was entitled to leave the service and the house at any time.

The Sheriff (Jameson) rejected the claim, whereupon the claimant required a case, which was accordingly stated by the Sheriff.

The foregoing facts were set forth, and this question of law was stated —"Whether, in respect of the foresaid facts, John Aitchison is entitled to be entered in the roll, in respect of the qualification set forth in the 3d section of the Act 48 and 49 Vict. c. 3?"

The claimant argued that though there was no contract of service, there was service in point of fact and exclusive occupation of the subject. These elements satisfied the statutory provision.[1]

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with the Sheriff, and I do not think it necessary to call for a reply. The application is founded on the 3d section of the Act of 1884 (48 and 49 Vict. c. 3), which provides that "where a man himself inhabits any dwelling-house by virtue of any office, service, or employment, and the dwelling-house is not inhabited by any person under whom such man serves in such office, service, or employment, he shall be deemed . . . to be an inhabitant-occupier of such dwelling-house as a tenant.

The question is whether upon the facts brought before us by the Sheriff it can be held that the appellant occupies the house by virtue of any office, service or employment. I am very clearly of opinion that the facts shew he occupies by virtue of being his father's son and not by virtue of service. To occupy by virtue of service means, that because of his service a man has a right to occupy certain premises. But there is in this case no allegation of service or employment, and nothing to connect the fact of the appellant living in the cottage with any relation which he holds as servant of his father.

LORD TRAYNER and LORD KINCAIRNEY concurred.

THE COURT affirmed the judgment of the Sheriff and dismissed the appeal.

failed to pay poor-rates in the sense of section 3 * of the Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868.

Held that R. was not disqualified, as no statutory notice of assessment had been sent to him in terms of section 18 of that Act.

AT a Registration Court for the parish of Cambusnethan and constituency of Mid-Lanark, the Sheriff-substitute (Mair) rejected the claim of William Neilson, labourer, to be entered on the roll as tenant of a house in Hill Street, Wishaw.

Neilson craved a case, in which the following facts were set forth :—

"In the Valuation-roll of Cambusnethan parish, for years 1888-9 and 1889-90, William Neilson is entered as tenant or occupier of the house, No. 50 Hill Street, Wishaw, of which John Russell, labourer, is entered as the proprietor. The rent of the house is entered at £3, 10s. It has been the invariable custom in the parish of Cambusnethan (as in many other parishes in Scotland) to assess the owner of heritable subjects for his tenant's proportion or share of the parochial rates in cases where the rental is under £4. It is optional to the owner to recover such portion or share of rates from his tenant. In such cases no assessment notice is sent to the tenant, although an entry for the assessment leviable in respect of his tenancy or occupancy appears on the column of assessment opposite his name in the collector's copy of the Valuation-roll. John Russell, the owner of the said subjects, was exempted by the parochial board from payment of parochial rates. In the collector's copy of the Valuation-roll, under the heading 'Exempted,' the assessment due both by John Russell and the claimant are entered as 'exempted.' The collector, in his schedule (D) to the Assessor, included the claimant's name as exempted from payment of parochial rates. It is admitted that the claimant was not exempted by a special resolution of the parochial board from payment of rates; further, admitted that no notice of assessment was sent him, and also that, although he has never hitherto paid rates, he has always been held entitled to vote."

The ground upon which the claim was rejected was that the claimant had been exempted from payment of poor-rates.

The questions of law for the decision of the Court of Appeal were—(First) Whether in the case of tenants and occupants with a rental less than £4, in which the assessment is levied only from the owner, exemp-

Section 3 of the latter Act enacts,—"Every man shall, on and after the year 1868, be entitled to be registered as a voter who is qualified as follows :— . . . provided that no man shall, under this section, be entitled to be registered as a voter who at any time during the said period of twelve calendar months shall have been exempted from payment of poor-rates on the ground of inability to pay, or who shall have failed to pay on or before the 1st day of August in the present, or the 20th day of June in any subsequent year, all poor-rates (if any) that have become payable by him in respect of said dwelling-house, or as an inhabitant of any parish in said burgh, up to the preceding 15th day of May." Section 18.—"Where any poor-rate due from an occupier of premises to which a right of voting is for the first time attached by this Act remains unpaid on the 15th day of May in any year, the collector of poor-rates for the parish in which such premises are situated shall, on or before the 25th day of July in the present, or the 1st day of June in any subsequent, year, unless such rate has previously been paid, or has been duly demanded by a demand-note served in like manner as the notice in this section referred to, give or cause to be given a notice in the form set forth in schedule (C) to this Act to every such occupier."

tion of the owner from both his own rates and those assessed on the rental of the house occupied by his tenant is sufficient to disqualify the tenant and occupant? and (second) Whether in the case as above, and where the owner, though assessed for his rates, fails to pay them by the 20th of June such failure on his part, while not disqualifying him as owner, is sufficient to disqualify the tenant and occupant?"

Argued for the appellant;—Exemption from payment of poor-rate meant exemption by resolution of the parochial board. The appellant had received no such exemption, and was, therefore, not disqualified on that ground.[1] There was no failure to pay. The appellant was entitled to believe that his landlord was paying the rates as he had formerly done. In order to disqualify him it was imperative, under the 18th section of the Act, that an assessment notice should be served upon him. This had been omitted.

There was no appearance in support of the judgment of the Sheriff substitute.

LORD KINNEAR.—The condition attached to the right of voting by the proviso in respect of which the appellant has been rejected by the Sheriff is, that a man shall be entitled to be registered who has been exempted from the payment of poor-rates on the ground of inability to pay, or who shall have failed to pay all poor-rates that have become payable by him. The Sheriff says that the appellant in this case was not exempted by a special resolution of the parochial board from the payment of rates, and therefore it is unnecessary to consider the branch of the proviso which is applicable to such exemption. The question is whether it can be said that this appellant has failed to pay his poor-rates in the sense of the enactment to which I have referred? The state of the facts is, that it has been the invariable practice in this parish to assess the owner for the tenant's share in cases where the rental is under £4, and when the owner is assessed it is optional for him to recover such share from his tenant. In such case no notice is sent to the tenant, although his name appears upon the Valuation-roll. It is stated in the case that the owner of the premises rented by the appellant was exempted by the parochial board, but it is admitted that no notice of assessment was ever sent to the appellant, and that although he himself had never hitherto paid his rates, he had always been held entitled to vote. If there had been no other provisions in the Act of Parliament except those in the 18th section, it seems to me the question might have been of some difficulty, but I think the difficulty altogether removed by the provision of the 18th section. That provision is as follows,—(quoted supra, p. 339, note.) In this case the appellant, according to the statement, had no reason to suppose that any assessment had become exigible from him. He had had no notice of assessment. He knew that the rates had previously been paid by his landlord and not himself, and that he had been held entitled to vote. It appears to me that in order to disqualify the appellant on account of failure to pay rates it was indispensable that he should have the statutory notice. I am therefore of opinion that the appellant is not disqualified.

LORD TRAYNER and LORD KINCAIRNEY concurred.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, and reversed the judgment of the Sheriff.

AT a Registration Court for the burgh of Edinburgh held on 2d October 1890 John Deuchar claimed to be enrolled on the register of voters for the burgh of Edinburgh (South Division) as a lodger. Joseph Train Gray objected.

The Sheriff (Crichton) admitted his claim, and the objector asked a case, in which the following facts were set forth as admitted:—"That the claimant has had, under agreement with his mother, who is the tenant, and the only other occupant of the house, to whom he pays rent, and with whom he resides in family, the sole use or occupancy, for the qualifying period, of a back bedroom in a half-flat house, 42 Morningside Road, and the joint use or occupancy of the dining-room, drawing-room, and bath-room. That the clear annual value of the claimant's rights of use or occupation aforesaid is sufficient, but that the value of the bedroom taken alone is insufficient."

The question of law for the decision of the Court of Appeal was,—"Whether the joint use of the dining-room, drawing-room, and bath-room by the claimant as aforesaid can be reckoned as part of a lodger qualification?"

Argued for the appellant;—The respondent could not be said to occupy premises of the requisite value "separately and as sole tenant." He was "sole tenant" only of the bedroom, and that was of insufficient value. The case of Brown v. Martin[1] was distinguishable from the present case, because in it the claimant had exclusive right by contract both the bedroom and the parlour on which he claimed to be enrolled, though other persons used the parlour.

Argued for the respondent;—The word "separately" in the statute did not mean "exclusively." The words of the statute excluded joint tenants and joint lodgers, but did not infer that the occupation might not be shared in by the landlord. Brown v. Martin was directly in point.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am unable to agree with the learned Sheriff in the view he has taken of this case. On a proper construction of the statute the question seems to me to be a clear one. The statute provides that "every man shall . . . be entitled to be registered as a voter . . . who is qualified as follows (that is to say) . . . as a lodger, has occupied in the same burgh, separately and as sole tenant, for the twelve months preceding the last day July in any year lodgings of a clear yearly value, if let unfurnished, of £10 upwards." Now, the statement of fact on which the Sheriff was asked sustain this claim was this—[His Lordship here quoted the statement admitted facts]. Now, it is of the bedroom alone that the applicant is said have the sole use or occupancy, and therefore it appears to me clear that cannot hold that he has, separately and as sole tenant, occupied lodgings of t qualifying value. The right of a sole tenant to the exclusive occupancy of l lodgings excludes a landlord just as much as anyone else claiming to be joi tenant with him. With regard to the case of Brown v. Martin, it appears me that the decision in that case proceeded upon the view that the applica had an exclusive right by contract to both the parts of the subject on which claimed, although other persons were accustomed to use one portion of it. T decision does not therefore appear to me to create any difficulty.

Counsel for the respondent were not called upon.

LORD KINNEAR.—I think this is a perfectly clear case. The claimant was de facto resident in the lodgings, for which he was paying rent, during nine months of the year, and he had access to them during the remaining three months. In point of fact he did not make use of them because he happened to be out of town. The fact that the other inhabitants of the house were also away does not, in my opinion, affect the question. I am accordingly of opinion that the respondent was resident in these lodgings during the statutory period.

Smith v. Falconer.

the provisions of the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1838, and if that were so, his residence in Edinburgh was merely incidental.

LORD KINNEAR.—The question of law put to us in this case is whether Mr John Campbell Smith is entitled to be enrolled as owner of the house No. 16 Nelson Street. Mr Smith does not occupy the house in Nelson Street. This is not a claim therefore to be enrolled as "inhabitant-occupier," but as "owner" of a house in which the appellant does not reside, and it appears to me that a claim in these circumstances can only be maintained under the Act of 1832 as modified by the Act of 1884.

Now, the Act of 1832 conferred the franchise upon "owners" of subjects of a certain yearly value within burghs. The Act of 1868 conferred the franchise on "inhabitant-occupiers" of a dwelling-house whether as owner or tenant, but the appellant is not an "inhabitant-occupier" of the house in question, and it is only in the character of "owner" that he can be placed upon the roll.

Now, the provision of the Act of 1832 is continued by the subsequent statute, and is still applicable to the qualification of ownership, and it enacts that an owner shall be qualified provided he resides within the burgh, or within seven miles of it, for six months prior to the period when the roll is made up.

The question is whether Mr Campbell Smith has resided for six months in the burgh of Edinburgh.

Now, it is stated in the case that he is Sheriff-substitute of Forfarshire at Dundee, and we are bound to take notice of the provisions of a public statute regulating the conditions under which such office can be held. The statute requires that the Sheriff "shall" reside within his jurisdiction, and shall not be elsewhere for more than six weeks in any year, nor for more than two weeks at any one time, except upon compliance with certain conditions. We must assume, I think, that the Sheriff-substitute is complying with the provisions of the statute, and therefore we have to consider the question whether a Sheriff who, as we must assume, has been residing within his jurisdiction according to the statutory enactment can possibly have been resident in Edinburgh contrary to the enactment.

I am of opinion that it is impossible to hold that he had such residence in Edinburgh as to comply with the provisions of the statute under which he claims to be enrolled. It is perfectly well settled by a decision, both here and in England, that in order to make out a constructive residence it is necessary that the party who may have been in fact absent from his alleged residence for a part of the necessary period should have power to return to it at any time, without breach of a legal obligation. Now, Mr Smith had no power to reside in Edinburgh for more than six weeks in any one year without a breach of the obligation imposed upon him by statute. I do not find in the case that the whole period of his stay in Edinburgh, taken together, amounted in fact to six months, and I do not think he can take any benefit from the doctrine of constructive residence, for the reason I have mentioned. I think we must hold his occupation of the Edinburgh house to be merely incidental, and that his true residence was in Dundee.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree that this question must be decided under the Act of 1832 as modified by the Act of 1884. The test of the appellant's right is residence within the burgh for a certain period. Upon the facts stated I am clearly of opinion that he has not resided in Edinburgh in any proper sense whatever.

No. 74.

Dec. 20, 1890. Smith v. Falconer.

But further, I think the appellant is precluded from saying that he has resided in Edinburgh, as that is equivalent to saying that he has disobeyed the statutory provisions under which he holds his office.

LORD KINCAIRNEY.—I have grave doubts as to the decision which your Lordships have given in this case.

In my view this is a pure question of fact, and I have difficulty in assuming anything contrary to the facts set forth in the case.

I doubt the propriety of taking into consideration the statutory duty of Sheriff-substitute as to residence.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal, and affirmed the judgment of the Sheriff appealed against.

In 1887 the business was converted into a limited company, M. becoming managing director and editor, and occupying, by arrangement with the other directors, a room on the premises of the annual value of more than £10, for his editorial work, as well as for his own private business. From 1885 he was entered on the Valuation-roll as tenant and occupier of the premises. The rent and taxes of the premises were paid by the company to the landlord, who was also secretary of the limited company, but there was no assignation of the lease to the company.

Held that M. was entitled to remain on the roll as tenant and occupier of the premises.

Registration Appeal Court. Lord Kinnear. Lord Trayner. Lord Kincairney. Sheriff of Inverness. C.

AT a Registration Court for the burgh of Inverness, held at Inverness on 30th September 1890, John S. Fraser, solicitor, objected to the name of Alexander Mackenzie, publisher, being retained on the roll as tenant and occupant of an office in High Street.

The Sheriff (Ivory) sustained the objection, and Mackenzie asked a case, in which the following facts were set forth as proved:—

"By lease, dated 22d April 1886, Kenneth Macdonald, town-clerk, Inverness (proprietor of the subjects), let to the claimant, who was sole partner of the firm of Mackenzie, Thomson, & Co., printers and publishers, the premises for which the claimant was entered in the roll of voters, for seven years from Whitsunday 1885, at a rent of £52, 10s. for the first two years, and £60 for the remaining five years of the lease. The lease expressly excluded heirs and assignees. From 1885 to 1887 the claimant was proprietor and editor of the Scottish Highlander weekly newspaper printed and published in the premises in question. In 1887 the newspaper was converted into a limited liability company, of which the claimant became, and continued to be, the managing director, and the newspaper continued to be printed and published in the premises under the claimant's editorship.

"Besides being editor of the paper Mr Mackenzie conducted, and con tinues to conduct, a separate business of his own in said premises as publisher of books, magazines, &c., of which business he was, and continues to be, sole proprietor. By arrangement with the directors of the Scottish Highlander Mr Mackenzie, as editor, has the use of one room in the said premises known as the 'Editor's Room,' for the conduct of the editorial work of the paper, and also for the conduct of his own separate business. But Mr Mackenzie failed to prove that he could not be dismissed from his office as editor at any time. The annual value of the room is more than £10. The rent of £60 and taxes of the whole premises, including the 'Editor's Room,' were paid by the Scottish Highlander Company, Limited, to Mr Kenneth Macdonald, the proprietor of the premises, and the salaried secretary of the said company, and Mr Mackenzie paid no part thereof. . . . In the Valuation-roll for the year 1887, and subsequent years, Mr Mackenzie is entered as tenant and occupant of the whole premises. But it was proved that the Scottish Highlander Company occupied the whole premises as tenants subsequent to 1887, with the consent and concurrence of Mr Kenneth Macdonald, their secretary. No written assignation or sublease of the premises however was granted by Mr K. Macdonald in favour of the said company."

The questions of law raised were,—"(1) Whether Mr Mackenzie is the occupant of the 'Editor's Room' in the said premises or the whole premises in the sense of the Registration Acts? (2) Whether Mr Alexander Mackenzie is the tenant of the said room or of the whole premises in the sense of the Registration Acts? (3) Whether, considering the terms of the lease and the entries in the valuation returns and Valuation-roll, it was competent to prove by the parole evidence of Mr Mackenzie and Mr K. Macdonald, the two parties to the lease (the latter being also the proprietor of the premises, who made the valuation returns), and the assessor, who prepared the Valuation-roll, that Mr Mackenzie was not the true tenant of the said premises, and also that he was not the true occupant thereof?"

Argued for the appellant;—(1) It was incompetent for the Sheriff to allow a proof to contradict the terms of the Valuation-roll.[1] (2) Upon the evidence, the company had no written lease connecting them with the premises. The appellant, on the other hand, was tenant under the lease, and had stood as tenant and occupant on the roll ever since the date of the lease. In any event, he was in occupation of one room of sufficient value.

Argued for the respondent;—It was competent to go behind the Valuation-roll and prove the actual state of occupancy.[2] The Sheriff had found as matter of fact that the entire premises were occupied by the company, who paid the rent. That was conclusive upon the question of occupancy. In regard to the editor's room, the facts proved shewed that the claimant was not in exclusive use of it.

LORD TRAYNER.—I have no difficulty in arriving at a conclusion upon the question raised in this case. I am clearly of opinion that the Sheriff has gone wrong. The person who was enrolled, and who has been struck off the roll, is the tenant under a regular lease from the proprietor, by which lease he is bound till 1892 to occupy the premises at a certain increasing rent. It is matter of fact that since he took the lease he has been in the possession of these subjects under the title which that lease conferred, and has been entered all these years, as he is now entered in the Valuation-roll, as the tenant and occupier. The Sheriff finds in point of fact that there has been no written assignation or sub-lease of the premises in favour of anybody else, and therefore the unrestricted and unlimited right of tenancy belongs to the claimant. In point of fact, the claimant is in the premises because, although there is an arrangement between him and the company, he has remained there as their servant, having use of a particular room. The Sheriff has come to the conclusion that the company occupies the premises, but I fail to see how he reaches that legal conclusion upon the facts as stated by him. In point of fact, Mackenzie is tenant; in point of fact, Mackenzie is in the premises. The Sheriff says he has failed to prove that he could not be dismissed. The question whether he could be dismissed or not has no relevancy to the question before us, and in any event, the burden of proof could not be upon him. I think it was entirely irrelevant to inquire into what was the private arrangement between Mackenzie and the company. I am accordingly clearly of opinion that the appellant's name should be put upon the roll.

With reference to the point raised by the third question put to us, I should be slow to affirm that parole evidence is not competent to get behind what is in the Valuation-roll. At the same time, such evidence should be allowed with great caution.

LORD KINCAIRNEY.—I cannot say that I have no difficulty in this case. I would prefer to rest my judgment on more limited grounds. The Sheriff says that Mackenzie, as editor, has use of one room "for the conduct of the editorial work of the said paper, and also for the conduct of his own separate business." I understand the Sheriff to say that Mackenzie has had the use of that room for the qualifying period. I do not see any indication that any other person has a right to use that room except Mackenzie. That satisfies the 5th section of the Act of 1884, and Mackenzie is therefore entitled to have his name placed upon the roll.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with Lord Trayner. I think that if the Scottish Highlander Company is in the occupation of the premises it occupies them through Mr Mackenzie, and in no other way, according to the statement which the Sheriff brings before us. I am therefore of opinion that Mr Mackenzie is occupant of the premises, and I have no doubt he is sole tenant.

The only additional observation I desire to make is, that I do not understand that either of your Lordships entertains any doubt as to the doctrine, which is quite well settled, that although the Valuation-roll is conclusive upon the question of value, it is not conclusive upon the question of occupancy; and if any relevant ground is stated for inquiry, there is no reason why proof should not be allowed as to the question of occupancy. The only difficulty which appeared in the argument upon that subject arose from Mr Orr's citation of the case of Rea, but that case does not really conflict in any way with what has always been understood to be the law on the subject. All that was decided there was that the particular proof asked in that case was inadmissible. The reason was clear. The tenant and occupant of a farm had been enrolled as a voter for the county of Perth. Then another person came forward, alleging occupation for the requisite period, and produced an assignation, dated 22d

February 1870, in support of his lease to the farm, which was dated in 1868. The Sheriff refused to allow the proof of occupancy, because he held that the claimant's right to be registered in virtue of the assignation must be regulated by the date of the assignation itself.

Election Law—Burgh Occupation Franchise—Combination of period of occupancy as lodger with period of occupancy as tenant—Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 48).—A period of occupancy as lodger cannot be combined with a period of occupancy as tenant and occupant of a dwelling-house within burgh so as to entitle the occupant to the burgh occupation franchise under the Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868.

Registration Appeal Court. Lord Kinnear. Lord Trayner. Lord Kincairney. Sheriff of the Lothians. C.

At a Registration Court for the burgh of Edinburgh, held at Edinburgh on 2d October 1890, James Falconer, W.S., 42 Heriot Row, Edinburgh, objected to the entry upon the voters' list of the name of John Lessels as "tenant and occupant" of 4 Dundonald Street. The ground of objection was that Lessels had not occupied the premises for the period of twelve months prior to 31st July 1890.

The Sheriff (Crichton) repelled the objection, and Falconer craved a case, in which the following facts were set forth:—"It was admitted that Mr Lessels did not become tenant or occupant of No. 4 Dundonald Street until the month of March 1890. It was, however, admitted that, for the period from 31st July 1889 to March 1890, he had occupied lodgings at No. 30 Royal Circus, of the annual value of £10, unfurnished. No claim had been made at this registration period by Mr Lessels as a lodger, but he was on the roll for 1889-90 as a tenant and occupant in respect of his lodgings at 30 Royal Circus aforesaid. I repelled the objection, and was required by the appellant to state a special case."

The question of law for the determination of the Court of Appeal was, "Whether John Lessels is entitled to be enrolled as tenant and occupant of No. 4 Dundonald Street, by virtue of his occupancy of the said lodgings at 30 Royal Circus from 21st July 1889 to March 1890, and of his occupancy of 4 Dundonald Street as tenant from March 1890 to 31st July 1890?"

Argued for the appellant;—The Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868, recognised two modes of occupancy, distinct in character, and requiring different proceedings to entitle the person qualified in respect of them to be placed upon the roll. Occupation qua lodger was not by a sufficient qualification. The person claiming on such an occupancy must put in his claim accompanied by a formal declaration attested by a witness.[1] The respondent had not done this, and had therefore never become properly qualified to vote as a lodger. But (2) assuming that h had complied with this formality, he was clearly not entitled to combi his lodger occupancy with his subsequent occupancy of a dwelling-hou as tenant and occupant.[1] It was true that section 13 of the Act auth rised the combination of two periods of successive occupancy of "differe premises." That, however, only applied where the different premi were occupied in the same character. Moreover, the interpretati clause of the Act which defined "premises" did not include a "dwellin house." The 11th section of the Reform Act, 1832,* which was found on as enfranchising lodgers as occupiers if they had occupied for t requisite period lodgings in cities, burghs, and towns of the yearly val of £10, had been repealed† by the Representation of the People A 1884, and therefore it was vain to appeal to the former Act.

Argued for the respondent;—By the 11th section of the Reform Act 1832 lodgers were admitted to the roll as occupiers of premises of t annual value of £10. The only change made by the Representation the People (Scotland) Act, 1868, with regard to lodgers was as to t manner in which they were to be registered. It was true that the 1 section of the Act of 1884 had repealed the first named enactment, b it really re-enacted it, for by section 5 it provided a franchise with t same qualification, making it apply to counties as well as to burghs. I was quite competent to combine the periods of occupancy here. T essential character of the respondent's occupancy was in both peri that of tenant and occupant. If he had changed his residence to ot lodgings of similar value, the two periods could have been combin under section 13 of the Act of 1868, and it would be anomalous if t obtaining of a higher qualification were to deprive him of his right vote.

At advising,—

Lord Kinnear.—In this case the respondent has been entered upon the r as tenant and occupant of the house No. 4 Dundonald Street. It is set forth the case that the respondent did not become tenant and occupant of these p mises until the month of March 1890, and therefore he has not been tenant occupant of these premises for a year prior to the last day of July. Du the previous part of the year, however, he occupied lodgings at No. 30 D Circus of the annual value of £10, unfurnished, and the question before us whether by virtue of these two terms of occupancy, first as a lodger, and af wards as tenant and occupant, he can be held to have satisfied the condi imposed by the statute, which requires that in order to be entitled to the house franchise a man must occupy, as owner or tenant, for twelve calendar mon before the 31st of July in the year in which he claims to be registered, a dwelli house in the burgh? It has been contended that as the respondent, if he changed his residence to other lodgings of similar value, could have combi the two terms of occupancy, it would be an anomaly if the obtaining of a hig qualification should deprive him of a right to vote, and that the Legislat could not have contemplated such a result. It was said that the principle on which the Legislature proceeded in providing that terms of occupancy as l might be combined, and that terms of occupancy as tenant and occupant mi be combined, applied with equal force to the case before us. But we are entitled to reject or sustain claims for registration upon any view we may take of the principle on which the Legislature proceeded in making these enactments.

We must proceed upon an interpretation of the words of the statutes. Now upon a construction of the statute, it appears to me that two things are clear—1st, That it distinguishes between two classes of voters enfranchised by its provisions—occupants of dwelling-houses and lodgers; and 2d, that the 13th section authorises the combination of two periods of occupation in the same character, but not the combination of a period of occupancy in one character with a period of occupancy in another character. It does not, in my opinion, authorise the combination of occupancy as owner with occupancy as tenant, or occupancy as tenant or owner with occupancy as lodger. The case of Moncrieff v. Dalgleish, December 19, 1868, 7 Macph. 315, I think, expressly so decides, and if the question were open I should be of the same opinion.

But it was maintained that the decision appealed against may be supported upon a ground upon which the learned Sheriff did not proceed. It is said that the respondent is entitled to be enrolled as tenant and occupant under the Reform Act of 1832 as modified by the Act of 1884. I am unable to give effect to that argument. The statute of 1868 enfranchises lodgers if they have occupied for the requisite period lodgings of the yearly value of £10 only if certain other conditions expressly laid down in the section have been satisfied. But the argument is that all lodgers whose lodgings are of the annual value of £10 are entitled to be registered although not one of these conditions has been satisfied. If that were so, the Act of 1868 would be futile as regards the lodger franchise. It appears to me that the intention and effect of the Act of 1868 is to enfranchise lodgers upon the conditions laid down, and upon these only. I am therefore of opinion, differing from the Sheriff, that Mr Lessels is not entitled to be enrolled.

LORD TRAYNER and LORD KINCAIRNEY concurred.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, and reversed the finding of the Sheriff, and remitted to him to expunge the respondent's name from the roll of voters.

The defender pleaded that tender of a good title was m too late, and that he was not bound to accept it. Held that the purchaser w bound to accept the title offered.

Carter v. Lornie.

The sanction of the Court having been obtained to the sale, Lornie, on 5th May 1888, paid the price of the new factory, and thereupon entered into possession of it. He removed certain machinery which was in it to one of his own mills.

On 24th October 1888 Messrs Gibson & Spears, writers, Kirkcaldy, Carter's law-agents, sent to Messrs Thomas Dow & Sons, writers, Kirkcaldy, Lornie's agents, the titles to the old factory (as to which no question was raised) in order that they might prepare a conveyance prior to the term of Martinmas. A copy of the lease which was the title to the new factory had previously been sent to Mr Lornie. Messrs Dow & Son had not hitherto acted in the matter, Lornie having dealt personally with Messrs Gibson & Spears. Upon examining the titles Messrs Dow & Sons took objection to the validity of the title to the new factory, and Lornie refused to take a disposition of the subjects. Some negotiations took place between the parties with a view to compromise, but these were unsuccessful. During these negotiations Lornie removed about 130 looms from the old factory to his own mill.

On 16th January 1889 Carter brought an action against Lornie, concluding for decree ordaining him to implement his part of the minute of agreement of sale of 22d and 23d March 1888 by accepting from him a valid disposition of the old factory, and by making payment to him of the sum of £2000, the agreed-on price and value of said subjects, with interest from Martinmas 1888, or, alternatively, for £2000 in name of damages.

The lease, which was the title to the new factory, was granted, in January 1874, by the Earl of Rosslyn, as heir of entail in possession of the entailed estate of Ravenscraig and others, and bore to be for the period of ninety-nine years from Martinmas 1871. It was granted under the powers conferred upon heirs of entail by the Act 10 Geo. III. cap. 51 (the Montgomery Act).* The lease contained the following conditions: "Declaring that the said James Speedie, Thomas Speedie, and John Speedie, as trustees foresaid, and the said firm of Robert Speedie & Sons, shall be bound, within three years from the said term of entry (Martinmas 1871), to build a dwelling-house or houses of stone, and slated, of the value of at least £50, and to keep and uphold said houses, and all other buildings which may be erected on said piece of ground, in good tenantable and sufficient repair during the currency of the lease . . . and in case the said tenants shall fail to build the said houses within the said space of three years, or in case they shall fail to keep the same in good tenantable and sufficient repair, then this tack shall ipso facto be void and null without any declarator or process of law for that effect. . . . And they hereby bind and oblige themselves and their foresaids to plant forest trees on the said vacant space, and attend to the cultivation thereof. . . ." Declaring that, in case they "shall fail to implement the foresaid obligations incumbent on them, or shall contravene any of the conditions and restrictions before specified, the said Earl or his foresaids shall be entitled to enter to the possession of said piece of ground, and t houses and other buildings erected or to be erected thereupon, in t same manner as if the whole years of this lease had expired, and th shall be entitled to remove the said James Speedie, Thomas Speedie, a John Speedie, as trustees foresaid, and the said firm of Robert Speedie Sons, and their foresaids, summarily from the possession of the said su jects." No dwelling-house or houses or boundary walls had been erect by the lessees, and no trees planted by them. The only building erect by them upon the ground was the linen weaving steam factory alrea mentioned.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(3) The defender having, in kno ledge of the objections now raised by him to the title to the new facto entered into possession of the old factory, he is bound to accept the co veyance thereof tendered to him by the pursuer, and to pay the price the said old factory, the price of the new factory having already be settled. (4) The pursuer having tendered to the defender a valid conve ance of the old factory, the defender is bound to accept the same and pay the price of the said old factory. (5) The defender having tak possession of both factories, and the machinery therein, and dealt wi the same as his own, and still continuing to do so, he is not entitled t refuse to pay the price of the said subjects, or any part thereof. (6) Th defender is barred from taking the objections he now seeks to do to t title to the new factory, by the terms of his agreement with the purs and is bound to accept an assignation of the lease thereof as the same present stands. (7) Separatim, The defender's objections to the title the new factory are unfounded, in respect (1) that, on a sound constru tion of the Montgomery Act, it is competent for an heir of entail grant a lease of land under the said Act for the purpose of building manufactory thereon; (2) that the special provisions in the lease question, founded on by the defender, having been inserted for the bene of the landlord, and having been waived or departed from by him, the no fulfilment thereof does not invalidate the said lease.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The pursuer not being able give the defender a valid conveyance of the subjects contained in the minute of sale, he is not entitled to sue for implement of the said minu

On 26th November 1889, after a variety of procedure, the purs lodged a minute, in which he stated that Lord Rosslyn, having obtain the necessary authority, had granted a new lease to the pursuer, and th "while not admitting the nullity of the former lease, and under reservation as aforesaid, the pursuer tendered, and hereby tenders, t said new lease to the defender as a valid title to the new factory, and implement of the obligations incumbent upon him under and in terms the minute of agreement of sale libelled so far as regards the title of t said new factory."

The new lease tendered by the pursuer was for 81½ years from the te of Whitsunday 1889. The consideration on the part of the tenant was tack-duty of £26, 16s., and an annuity of £10 purchased from the Nor British and Mercantile Insurance Company, payable to the heir of entail in possession and his successors in the entail. The lease contained th clause,—"Declaring, as it is hereby expressly provided and declared, th if at any time the tenants shall allow two years' payment of the before mentioned yearly rent or tack-duty of £26, 16s. to run on into the thir unpaid, they shall ipso facto lose and forfeit this tack, which shall then upon fall and return to the said Earl of Rosslyn and his foresaids witho any declarator to be raised to that effect, and without any payment f the houses which may be erected on the said piece of ground, and witho prejudice to the right of the said Earl and his foresaids, to draw and receive payment of the before-mentioned annuity during the whole period of the said bond, notwithstanding that the said tack may have been forfeited or have come to an end."

The defender, on 18th December 1889, was allowed to amend his record by adding the two pleas following:—(4) The defender should be assoilzied, on the ground that, even if the title which the pursuer has obtained from Lord Rosslyn is good, the same was not obtained till November 1889, and was not timeously offered to the defender; and that the delay in procuring and offering a title has been so great as entirely to defeat the purpose for which the defender originally made the purchase. (5) The pursuer not having been able timeously to implement his contract, the defender should be assoilzied.

On 23d May 1890, the Lord Ordinary (Trayner) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that the defender, John Guthrie Lornie, is bound to implement and fulfil his part of the minute of agreement mentioned on record, and that by accepting from the pursuer, Frederick Walter Carter, a valid disposition containing all usual and necessary clauses of the subjects described in the conclusions of the summons at the instance of the said pursuer against the said defender, the said disposition to be adjusted (if necessary) at the sight of Mr H. B. Dewar, S.S.C., and by making payment to the pursuer of the sum of £2000 sterling, with interest thereon from 11th November 1888 till this date, at the bank rates current during that period on deposit-accounts, and at the rate of 5 per cent from this date till paid, and decerns: Finds the said pursuer liable to the said defender in the expenses of process down to the 26th November 1889, and the said defender liable in expenses from and after that date," &c.*

* "OPINION.—The leading question is, whether the defender, Mr Lornie, is bound to implement a contract or agreement entered into between him and the pursuer, Mr Carter, on 22d March 1888, the terms of which are quoted on record. By that contract or agreement the defender agreed to purchase from the pursuer two factories situated in Sinclairtown, with the engines and machinery therein, at a certain price payable at certain specified dates. It was, inter alia, a condition of the agreement that the defender should accept 'the title to the said subjects as it at present stands, and subject to all exceptions of any nature.' The defender refuses to implement the contract on various grounds. He maintains (1) that while the title to the 'old factory' is unobjectionable, the title to the 'new factory' offered to him originally (that is, the title to the new factory as it stood at the date of the contract) is null; that the title now offered to him is also null, or at all events defective; that even if the title now offered is held to be a good title he is not bound to accept it, as it has not been timeously offered, and that if he is not bound to implement the contract as regards the 'new factory,' he is not bound to implement any part of it, as the contract was one and inseparable for the purchase of the two factories.

"This latter proposition I am prepared to adopt, and I think it was not seriously contested by the pursuer. The main question therefore regards the title to the new factory offered to the defender.

"The title to that factory at the date of the contract in question consisted of a long lease granted under the provisions of the Montgomery Act by the Earl of Rosslyn to Speedie & Sons, dated 12th and 20th January 1874. The lease itself is conform to the statutory provisions, and no objection is stated against its validity. It provides that the tenant shall be bound, within three years of their term of entry (declared to be the term of Martinmas 1871), 'to build a dwelling-house or houses of stone, and slated, of the value of at least £50,' &c. In fact no dwelling-house was ever erected on the ground, although a spinning factory of very much greater value than £50 was, and the defender maintains that the fact that no 'dwelling-house' was erected on the ground nullifies the

Argued for the reclaimer;—The title now offered by the respondent was not a title which the reclaimer was bound to accept. The lease contained a valuable consideration other than the rent, contrary to the provisions of sec. 24 of 11 and 12 Vict. c. 36 (The Rutherfurd Act),* and lease under the express provision of the 5th section of the Montgomery Act. The pursuer's answer to this contention is that the Montgomery Act was an enabling Act, and is to be liberally construed, and that looking to the purpose for which the Act was passed (as expressed in section 4), the erection of a factory may be regarded as compliance with the requirements of the statute as one of the things which might conduce to the formation of a 'village.' In support of this view I was referred to the opinion of Lord Kinloch in Miller v. Carrick (5 Macph. 718). With the greatest deference to that opinion, I am unable to hold that the building of a factory is a compliance with the statutory requirement, which in definite and precise terms exacts the erection of a dwelling-house. No doubt the existence of a factory might lead to the construction of dwelling-houses, and the consequent formation of a village, and the erection of factories is not forbidden. But what the statute requires as a condition of the validity of a lease granted under its provisions is the erection of a dwelling-house, and that has not been complied with. The statutory nullity has therefore, in my opinion, been incurred; by no liberality of construction can I read 'factory' or 'spinning mill' for 'dwelling-house.' It follows from what I have said that the defender was not bound to accept such a title to the 'new factory.' The clause in his contract binding him to accept the pursuer's title as it stood, subject to all exceptions, does not affect the defender's right to reject the title offered to him. That clause merely binds the defender to accept a title, defective it may be, and as it stands not marketable, but a title which can be made good. It does not bind him to accept what is not a title at all. The pursuer, however, does not now insist on the defender accepting the title as it originally stood. He has procured at his own expense a title to the subject sold from the Earl of Rosslyn, which appears to me to be open to no objection, and this he offers to the defender. That title, as a valid title to the new factory, I think the defender is now bound to accept. I repel the defender's plea that he is not bound to accept that title because not timeously offered. That plea was only put upon record after the new title had been tendered to the defender. But he had been in actual possession of the factory and of machinery from the date of entry stipulated in his contract, and had treated the machinery therein as his own after he knew of the objection to the original title. No one has ever interfered with his possession or challenged his title.

"This case I regard as one not only distinguished from, but in contrast to the case of Kelman (5 R. 816), to which I was referred by the defender. The views expressed by Lord Gifford in that case regarding the right in the general case to rescind a bargain where the title has not been timeously offered are, I think, applicable to this case.

"(2) The defender farther maintained that he was not bound to implement the contract in question, because he had entered into it under essential error induced by the misrepresentations and concealment of the pursuer's agents. The averments on which this plea is based are, in my opinion, not only not proved, but are not true. It is unfortunate for the defender that his evidence (the only evidence supporting this part of the case) is not only contradicted by other witnesses, but is itself contradictory of the statements made by him on record. I do not go into the details of the evidence, but I may say that I have had no hesitation in rejecting the defender's evidence wherever it has been contradicted. . . .

"As regards expenses, I find Mr Lornie entitled to expenses down to the 26th November 1889, when the new title was tendered to him, and liable in expenses from that date."

* The Act 11 and 12 Vict. cap. 36 (The Rutherfurd Act), sec. 24, provides,—"And be it enacted, that notwithstanding any prohibitory, irritant, and resolutive was therefore null and void. The annuity of £10 was such a consideration. No doubt it was made payable to the heirs of entail in succession, but that had not the effect of entailing it. It was quite within the power of the present heir of entail to sell it. The third article in the agreement did not bind the reclaimer to accept a totally bad title. It could only apply where the title could be cured by some conveyancing process, in fact, where the rectification of the title was a question of expense only.[1]

Argued for the respondent;—(1) The reclaimer was bound to accept the original title offered. That title was no doubt liable to question, but it was not settled that it was bad.[2] Lord Kinloch's opinion (Miller, 5 Macph. 715) was in favour of its validity. Lord Colonsay (6 Macph. (H. L.) p. 105) reserved his opinion. The exception being one which might or might not be taken and sustained fell within the third clause of the agreement.[3] (2) The reclaimer was barred from objecting to the title. He had taken possession of the old mill after he knew of the defect in the title and had raised the question regarding it. (3) In any event, the reclaimer was bound to accept the title now offered. The annuity was not a consideration struck at by the Rutherfurd Act. It was payable to the successive heirs of entail.[4]

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—This action is brought by Mr Carter, the judicial factor on the sequestrated estates of Robert Speedie & Sons, to have Mr Lornie, the defender, decerned and ordained to implement and fulfil his part of a certain minute of agreement of sale of two power-loom factories belonging to the first party, as judicial factor foresaid, with the whole machinery therein, entered into between the defender and pursuer of date 22d and 23d March 1888. The answer to the pursuer's claim made by the defender is that he is not bound to implement his part of the agreement, because the pursuer cannot give him full implement of his part.

By the agreement in question Mr Carter, the pursuer, agreed to sell, and Mr Lornie, the defender, to purchase, two large power-loom factories in Sinclairtown, with the steam-engines and machinery therein, on the following terms:—The price was to be £2000 for each factory and the machinery therein; the price of the new factory being payable within six weeks from the date of the agreement and the price of the old factory at Martinmas 1888. The third clause of the agreement contains a condition of which we have heard a good deal. It is in these terms:—"(Third) The second party shall accept the title to the said subjects as it at present stands, and subject to all exceptions of any nature, and the first party shall not be bound to grant warrandice, except from his own proper facts and deeds only."

Now, it is to be observed that it is not disputed, and could not be, I suppose that the purchase of the two factories is all one contract, the price being £4000. Not long after the date of the agreement the defender paid £2000 as the price of the new factory, and got possession of both factories; and what is now sought as the fulfilment of the agreement between the parties, is that the defender should pay £2000 for the old factory, and accept a disposition of the old factory. The defender, however, although he has no objection to the title to the old factory, answers, and rightly in my opinion, that the contract is one contract for the sale of both the factories, and that the pursuer cannot give him a good title—that is, a title he is bound to accept—to the new factory. The question whether the pursuer is entitled to insist on the agreement being implemented turns on whether the pursuer is or is not in a position to give the defender a title which he is bound to accept.

The pursuer puts his case in two ways. He says, in the first place,—"I offered you, and still offer you, an existing lease, which is a good lease, and constitutes a good title to the new factory"; and, as an alternative, the pursuer offers the defender a second lease, which he says is a good title to the subjects at least in this sense, that it is a title which the defender is bound to accept. The question whether the leases tendered are or are not titles of that kind depends on the construction of the third head of the agreement. The pursuer contends, having regard to that clause, that they are, and the defender that they are not.

The clause is not of an unfamiliar kind, and I have always understood that such clauses applied to and covered defects in the progress of titles or other defects of that kind which could be remedied, but that it did not apply where it could be shewn that no good title could be given. I think the meaning of such a clause is, as Lord Kinnear put it in the course of the discussion, that the purchaser is bound to take a marketable title, and nothing else.

The question then comes to be whether the leases in this case are such titles as the purchaser is bound to accept. The first lease, which was originally tendered to the defender bears to be entered into between the Earl of Rosslyn and the trustees of John Speedie, and is dated in January 1874. It is granted by the Earl of Rosslyn as an heir of entail, and, though on the face of the lease there is no reference to the Montgomery Act, it is admitted that only under that Act could such a lease have been granted. It contains consequently, in terms of that Act, this stipulation:—"Declaring that the said James Speedie, Thomas Speedie, and John Speedie, as trustees foresaid, and the said firm of Robert & Sons, shall be bound, within three years from the said term of entry, to build a dwelling-house or houses of stone, and slated, of the value t £50." Now, it is admitted that the building erected is, and always , a factory, and that no dwelling-house has been erected, and therefore tion to the lease is that, in terms of the Act, it is null and void. I do that we are bound in this case to decide whether it is an absolutely as regards a question with an heir of entail. It is enough to say that, n its face so patent an objection, it is not a marketable title, or such a purchaser is bound to take.

uestion under the second lease is different. It is rather a curious docu- As the reporter says in his report to the Lord Ordinary, it is a novel lease. The Earl of Rosslyn agrees to accept an annual payment of . in respect of the lease, but that consideration is made up in a curious addition to the rent of £26, 16s. stipulated for from the tenant, the rates that the pursuer has purchased from the North British and Mer- nsurance Company an annuity of £10, payable to the Earl of Rosslyn successors in the entail for the period of the lease, and that he has ver to the Earl the bond under which the annuity is payable in pur- f the arrangement under which the lease is granted. These two sums 16s. and £10, it is said, "together make up the yearly sum of £36, 16s., e whole amount of the annual rent or tack-duty for the said subjects, as d and arranged between the parties hereto, and set forth in the petition entioned." Then follows a clause declaring "that if at any time the shall allow two years' payment of the before-mentioned yearly rent or of £26, 16s. to run on into the third unpaid, they shall ipso facto forfeit this tack."

aid that that is so clearly a valid lease that the defender is bound to It is certainly novel to make part of the rent payable in the form of ty by an insurance company. Suppose,—improbable as it may appear,— North British and Mercantile Insurance Company failed, what would osition of an heir of entail under the lease? He could recover £26, 16s. only from the tenant. How could anyone maintain that in that case e was not to the prejudice of the heir of entail and reducible. It is in ion impossible to make an obligation by an insurance company or other on of that kind part of the consideration for a lease. If such an obliga- to be accepted, why not a guarantee by a private individual? In my e rent of land is payable out of the fruits of the land, and on that ground rs to me that this lease is not such a title as the purchaser is bound to because it discloses on its face that it is not marketable.

pursuer thus being in my opinion not able to implement his part of the nt by tendering to the defender a marketable title, that would be an the case, were it not that the pursuer maintains alternatively, that the r is barred by his conduct and actings from insisting in any such plea the title tendered him is not marketable. As I understand it, the ground contention is that the defender knew that the first lease was bad, and that nstanding this knowledge he entered into possession of the subjects. I able to follow that argument. So far as I can see, the defender took up ition that the contract entitled him to have a valid title, and that he into possession under the agreement for such a title, and was quite d to act as owner of the property purchased by him. I do not think it is proved that he knew the lease to be a bad lease, and indeed the pursuer does not yet admit that to be the case. I cannot see anything in the defender's acting which disentitles him to stand on his right to have a good marketable title given him, and I am therefore of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary must be recalled.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree entirely with the opinion of Lord Adam, and should only like to add, what I presume his Lordship will have no difficulty in accepting, that, although the title tendered to the defender were not marketable, he would be bound to accept it if it could be made marketable by some expenditure which he could incur, and that by his acceptance of the stipulation in the 3d clause of the agreement. But the objection he states is not one that could be amended by anything he could do, or apparently by anything the pursuer could do either.

LORD ADAM.—I quite agree with the observation made by Lord Kinnear, that the defender would have been bound to accept the title if it could have been made marketable by some expenditure on his part. I thought that I had indicated that in what I said as to defects in the progress of titles, and other defects of a similar kind which can be remedied.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am of the same opinion as Lord Adam, and I also concur with the observations made by Lord Kinnear. If the objection to the title were that it is bad as it stands, and if it were capable of being made a good title, the dispute would then resolve itself into the question, who was to bear the expense of making the title good, and that would depend on the terms of the agreement. I agree that if the title were in the position that it could be made good, there would be strong ground for the contention that the defender should bear the expense of making it good. But the case is not of that kind.

I would add in conclusion that the only difference of opinion between the Lord Ordinary and ourselves is as regards the second lease tendered to the defender, because the Lord Ordinary is clearly of opinion that the first lease granted under the Montgomery Act, is not a good title. The part of his opinion to which we take exception is the following:—"The pursuer, however, does not now insist on the defender accepting the title as it originally stood. He has procured at his own expense a new lease from the Earl of Rosslyn, which appears to me to be open to no objection, and this he offers to the defender. That title as a valid title to the new factory, I think the defender is now bound to accept." That is really the only point of difference between the Lord Ordinary and ourselves, and as regards that point I entirely agree with Lord Adam.

After the Court had advised the case, counsel for the pursuer stated that Lord Rosslyn who had granted the two leases which had been considered by the Court had died, and that the pursuer had reason to believe that his successor who had been born since 1st August 1848, and who could accordingly disentail the entailed lands without consents, would disentail the lands and grant him a lease of the new factory for the unexpired portion of the former lease, which he would then be in a position to tender to the defender as a valid title.

The Court, on 13th November 1890, recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and appointed parties to be further heard.

On 11th December counsel for the pursuer tendered a minute in which it was stated that a letter had been received from Lord Rosslyn, offering to apply to the Court for disentail of the lands, and on that being obtained to execute a new lease of the new factory for the unexpired portion of the former lease; and that the pursuer undertook to obtain such a lease to be adjusted at the sight of the Court and to tender it to the defender in fulfilment of his agreement. Counsel for the defender objected to the minute being received, on the ground that the defender was not now bound to accept the title offered in fulfilment of the pursuer's obligation.

It was agreed that the discussion should proceed on the footing that there was now tendered to the defender a title which was open to no objection.

Argued for the defender;—The tender was not timeous (1) as a matter of process, (2) as a matter of contract. (1) The pursuer closed the record upon a definite view of the law. He was allowed afterwards to tender a new lease and amend his record. Upon the record so amended he had gone to final judgment. He was not now entitled to ask that the process be so altered that he would be enabled to present to the Court a new ground of action. That would be equivalent to a new action.[1] (2) As matter of contract the tender was too late. The pursuer had broken his contract. The possession which the defender had had did not amount to more than the keeping of a caretaker in the factories. It was not such complete possession as he was entitled to under the agreement. His position was therefore the same as if he had not obtained possession at all. That being so he was entitled to refuse the present tender.[2]

Argued for the pursuer;—Beyond the question of expenses no question of process was involved in the present tender. When a title was held to be unmarketable the course followed by the Court was either to sist process till a valid one could be obtained, or to dismiss the action.[3] As matter of contract the tender was timeous, as the defender had had full and complete possession from the dates contracted for.

LORD PRESIDENT.—According to the view which I take of this case, it can be disposed of on a very simple ground. Referring back to what was decided in November last, it appears to me that the important fact upon which everything hinges here is the fact that the purchaser of the new factory, which was a lease-hold subject, took possession upon his title as purchaser, and upon no other title. The possession taken embraced not only a heritable subject, but a great deal of machinery. That machinery the defender has proceeded to dispose of and use for his own purposes as the proprietor thereof. That being so, it appears to me that the defender's mouth is entirely shut against maintaining the plea that this bargain of sale has come to an end through lapse of time, or through failure on either side to fulfil the contract, because the contract has been to a certain extent fulfilled and taken advantage of by himself. The parties cannot be restored against what has been done, because the possession taken by the defender has innovated the whole matter, and converted the machinery in the factory into machinery for his own factory at Pathhead. I can therefore pa no attention to the plea that this contract may now be regarded as having com to an end. Now, that being the state of matters it seems to follow almost necessity that the bargain being still an undissolved bargain if it be capable being carried out must be carried out, and the defender cannot refuse to do s He is now offered what appears and what we assume at present to be a goo title to the new factory premises, and he is bound to take that title.

LORD ADAM.—The pursuer now tenders, in order to get implement of his co tract with the defender, a lease which we must assume for the purposes of th argument to be a good lease. The answer made by the defender is that this lea is tendered too late, for two reasons, in the first place in respect of the period the process at which the tender is made, and in the second place in respect certain facts and circumstances apart from the matter of process.

With regard to the first of these objections, I think Mr Johnston advanc a proposition for which there is no authority at all, because his contenti practically came to this, that, wherever a party selling a property produces doubtful title, he is not entitled to have the opinion of the Court on the qu tion whether it is a marketable title or not, except on the penalty, if the opini of the Court is against him on that matter, of losing all right to insist on impl ment of his contract. I think there is no foundation for such a propositi either in authority or practice. So far as I know the practice of the Court is the other way, for the necessity of tendering a new title only arises when t Court has pronounced an opinion adverse to the quality of the title first offer The objection to a title may be on various grounds. It may be objected th there are objectionable clauses in the title, or that the progress is defective, that the title is not a good title at all. But as soon as the pursuer can cure defect in the progress of titles, if that is the defect complained of, or can pr duce a good title in place of a defective title, he is entitled to offer that title the defender, and insist on implement of the contract of sale.

Now, what is the difference between such a case and the present? The o difference is that the pursuer in this case could not, till recently, cure the de in the title he offered to the defender, but to my mind that makes no differen because he now makes a tender of a good title, and it does not matter m whether six months ago it was not in his power to make such a tender. Th disposes of the defender's objection on the matter of process.

The next objection is that the new lease is tendered too late, because two ye and a-half have elapsed since the date of the agreement between the parties. think there might be a great deal in that objection if matters had remain entire, and the defender had not entered into possession of the subjects, wh he was entitled to under the agreement, as was stated to be the case in some the authorities quoted to us, or had even declined to enter into possession the ground that the title tendered to him was defective. He might or mig not in these circumstances have had a good plea for repudiating the contra but there is no place for such a plea here, because the pursuer put the defend in possession of the subjects even before the date at which he was entitled possession under the agreement, and the defender has since continued in poss sion of them, and has intromitted with and carried away a great part of th moveable subjects, which are of equal value to the heritable subjects, to anothe place. That being the state of the case, the defender now comes forward an

'I admit that the pursuer now offers me a good title, and that I have ssession, but the offer is made too late." That is a contention to which not listen for a moment, and I think, therefore, that the pursuer's tender of lease is not too late on either of the grounds maintained by the defender.

D M'LAREN.—The argument for the defender was maintained under two es, a question of process and a question of contract. I confess I have en able to see any clear distinction between these two grounds. It seems that the whole argument resolves into this, that the purchaser claims to titled to be freed from his contract, because he says that the fulfilment of ontract on the part of the seller has come too late. There are cases no where one party to a contract of sale may resile. The strongest case pro- is that of disconformity between the subject offered and the subject pro- d to be sold. Even there the rule is not absolute; because, while in the of sales of goods we generally hold that any disconformity entitles the pur- er to reject the goods, that is not so in contracts relating to buildings or hinery. It is then a question of degree, and for slight disconformity we do hold that the purchaser may put an end to the contract. Then there is the ction that possession has not been given in due time, and looking to the s cited, I think that wherever it can be shewn that immediate possession of the essence of the contract, we should apply the same rule to sales of tage as we do in the case of sales of moveables deliverable at noted times. the other hand, if the purchase is merely for investment, and there is nothing uggest that in the intention of either of the parties time was of any great nent, I should not hold that delay in giving possession necessarily infers a charge or rescission of the contract. But certainly the weakest of all cases rescission is the case here offered, where the seller is in a position to give mediate possession, where possession has in fact been given; where the only ault which has arisen is in the title originally offered, and the seller has been ng his best to cure the infirmity in the title to the property. Mr Johnston not shew that the purchaser had suffered any damage except the cost of in- tigating the title in the Courts of law, and for this he is no doubt entitled e indemnified. I therefore agree with your Lordship that there is no sub- nce in the defence now stated, and that if a good title is now offered by the er, the purchaser may be compelled to take it, and to pay the price.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT repelled the fifth plea in law for the defender; allowed the minute for the pursuer to be received; continued the cause; found the pursuer entitled to the expenses of this discussion, and reserved all other questions of expenses.

An action was raised by a married woman, with concurrence of her husban against an unmarried man for payment of aliment for a child of which t woman had been delivered on 5th January 1890. The marriage had tak place on 30th August 1889, the woman being thirty years old, her husba forty. The act of connection with the defender was said to have tak place on 7th April 1889, and on 12th April the proposal for the marri which afterwards took place had been made and was shortly afterwar accepted. Both husband and wife deponed that no antenuptial connection h taken place between them, but evidence was led to shew that they had be seen walking together at night about the end of March or beginning of Apr the man having his arm about the woman's waist. They stated that the wi had told her future husband some weeks after their engagement that she w with child to the defender. The husband held no communication with t defender till the child was born, when he wrote to him calling upon him take the child away. THIS action was raised in the Sheriff Court at Dumfries in March 189 by Mrs Jane White or Kerr, wife of Samuel Kerr, shoemaker, Sanquhar, wi his concurrence, against William Lindsay, shovel-finisher, Sanquhar, co cluding for inlying expenses and aliment of a child borne by the pursu on 5th January 1890, of which the defender was alleged to be the fathe

The pursuer and her husband were married on 30th August 1889.

The pursuer averred that for two or three years previous to the co ception of the child, the defender had paid attention to her, called fr quently to see her at her mother's house, took long walks with her in th neighbourhood of Sanquhar, and had repeated connection with her, an in particular had connection with her on or about the 7th April 188 when she alleged the child was conceived.

The pursuer denied having had connection with her husband prior t their marriage.

The defender admitted having had connection with the pursuer pri to the month of March 1889, but denied that there had been connectio between them subsequent thereto. He also averred that the pursuer husband was himself the father of the child.

On a proof the pursuer deponed to the truth of the facts averred b her. With regard to her communication to her husband of the fact o her pregnancy, she deponed,—"On or about the 12th April of that yea 1889, Samuel Kerr offered me marriage, and I accepted it. I told him would have to see defender before I could give him an answer. I di not tell Kerr at that time that I had had connection with Lindsay, but told him a few weeks afterwards. I agreed to marry him, but it wa resolved to postpone the marriage. I went and saw defender and tol him what was wrong with me. He owned the child, and said he would do what was in his power for it. He seemed very sorry. It would b fully a month after the child was begotten. . . . * "NOTE.— . . . . . The pursuer's child was born on 5 last, and her marriage did not take place till 30th August 1889, presumption arises out of the fact of the marriage. The defe is rather that there is a presumption that the child is Samuel K that he married her although he knew that she was pregnant. that is a fair argument to use, but a presumption—especially is not the subject of a rule of law—is not proof, and this p is not an irresistible one. I have known a good many cases have acted in the way in which Samuel Kerr says he has done. a matter of taste. Some men would not marry an unchaste wom would, and many do. Very few would marry a woman who was another man, but experience shews that some men do. Again, ma hope most men if they did so,—would rather seek to hide their w than expose it in a Court. But this again is a matter of taste. To s it may be a matter of compulsion with Mr Kerr, because he appears risk of having to stand discipline unless he can shew that the begotten by another man. I do not think there is any evidence to he was ever unduly intimate with the pursuer before marriage. . .

"It was argued for him that the fact that he was an elder in a ch a presumption in his favour. Left to myself I would not have so held case of Martin v. Smith (17th May 1834, 12 S. 604, 6 Scot. Jur. 329 was entertained by the Court, and it has been acted on since. As defender, the points which tell against him to a certain extent are h connection with the pursuer at a date prior to the conception, and her o been held that the combination of such facts as these with continued are sufficient to prove a pursuer's case. What is to be considered opp a question of circumstances. I have generally held that there was either when the parties lived in the same house or at the same far or (where they lived at different places) when they had been seen suspicious circumstances. Here the opportunity is very meagrely unless the fact that the parties lived in the same place as they did nection admittedly took place is sufficient. . . .

"On the whole, I am of opinion, though I have arrived at it with that opportunity has been proved.

"I also think that the alleged admission of the paternity is prov the manner of the witnesses, I believe Hiddleston and Sharp rathe defender, and M'Millan's evidence did not shake my opinion. I do reason to believe that Hiddleston concocted the story. He told it this case was or could be thought of, and he gave his evidence appa reluctance."

against the defender. But the presumption of fact that the husband is himself the father was almost insuperable. There was very considerable intimacy between them prior to their marriage, and even apart from the marriage there would have been a strong case against Kerr. And when it was admitted that he knew of her condition for months before the marriage it was impossible not to believe that he was the father, or thought so. The Sheriff's ground of judgment, viz., that the defender admitted having had connection with pursuer in February, and that opportunity for its renewal existed in April, was unsound. This case was practically ruled by the cases of Gardner and Reid v. Mill.[1]

The pursuer argued;—The evidence of Hiddleston was quite distinct as to the defender having admitted paternity, and there was no reason why he should not be believed. This was the Sheriff's view, and there was no need to traverse Gardner or Reid v. Mill. In these cases, moreover, the spouses were clearly convicted of falsehood, in saying that there had been no intimacy between them before marriage.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—This is a very curious case, and presents some very serious features. It is certain that the pursuer, Mrs Kerr, and her present husband became engaged to be married almost immediately after she had become pregnant, and that the marriage which followed a few months after was entered into by him in full knowledge of her condition. It is also certain that in the spring of 1889 she had had connection with the defender, and it is quite possible that the child might have been his.

It was a most extraordinary position for a man to take up to marry his wife knowing that she was pregnant, and then when the child is born immediately to proceed to bastardise it. That is a most unlikely thing for any man to do, and Kerr gives no explanation of his conduct. It appears that he is an elder of the U. P. Church, and it seems to me that if he had been an innocent man this would have made him averse to run the risk of having his wife give birth to a child a few months after marriage. He is also, it must be kept in view, a man of mature years, a widower with a family, and not an inexperienced youth led on by a designing woman. It accordingly seems to me that his conduct must be taken as an attempt to do his best to repair a wrong he had done to the woman. Apart from the husband's actings, it might be quite as likely that the defender was the father of the pursuer's child as that he was not, but the evidence of the pursuer's witnesses is extremely indefinite, and there is nothing in the proof to displace the presumption of fact arising from Kerr marrying the pursuer when he knew she was pregnant that the pursuer and her husband had had antenuptial connection, and that it was in consequence of it that they got married.

Lord Young.—The question in this case is whether the pursuer has proved as a matter of fact that the defender is the father of the child. I think she has not, and I am even prepared to find in fact that he is not. The pursuer's husband, a man of forty, a widower, and an elder of a dissenting church, begins courting a mill-worker of twenty-nine. Their sweethearting commenced about March; he proposed on 12th April and was accepted. He has been seen out with her pretty late at night, and with his arm round her waist. On his own crop 1890 on his farm, including the portion assigned to the crofters. The crops so sown by him on that portion amounted to 14 acres of bere, 3 acres of potatoes, and 16 acres of turnips.

On 4th September 1890, in order to preserve his right to reap the crops, he brought a suspension of the decree of ejection. He stated that he did not dispute that the respondents were entitled to get possession of the assigned land, but contended that the decree of ejection ought to be qualified by a reservation of his right to reap the crops sown by him in good faith. It was further stated that the first cutting of hay had been already removed by the respondents.

The respondents stated, inter alia:—"It is believed and averred that no part of the seeds for crop 1890 were sown until six weeks or thereby after 3d March 1890, when decree conform was pronounced by the Sheriff as above narrated. During the period since said terms of entry the complainer has had no title to occupy or enter upon said lands, or to interfere with the crops thereon, and his occupation thereof and interference therewith are and have been vitious and illegal." They further stated:—"It is believed and averred that the complainer, so far from sowing the crops referred to in good faith, refused to sow said crops on the land which had been assigned to the respondents, in respect that he had no longer any right to continue in possession of said land, and that he at last consented to do so only after peremptory orders had been given him to that effect by the proprietors, who at the same time undertook to relieve him of all loss he might suffer thereby."

The complainer pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The complainer having sown the crops in said land in bona fide, is entitled to reap the same, and the decrees of ejection complained of being in prejudice of his said right, he is entitled to suspension thereof as craved.

The respondents pleaded, inter alia;—(1) No title to sue. (2) No relevant or sufficient ground of suspension has been stated by the complainer. (3) The respondents having the sole right and title to the possession of the said lands and the crops growing thereon, the complainer is bound to remove therefrom. (4) The complainer having sown said crops in mala fide, and at his own risk, is not entitled to suspension of the decrees of ejection complained of, and the note should be refused, with expenses.

The Lord Ordinary (Trayner), on 14th November 1890, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repels the first and second pleas in law for the respondents: Finds that the crops mentioned on record having been sown by the complainer belong exclusively to him, and that the respondents have no right to the same, and to this effect sustains the second plea in law for the complainer, and repels the second plea in law for the respondents: Quoad ultra continues the cause: Grants leave to reclaim."*

* "OPINION.—In 1889 the members of the Crofters Commission, by virtue of their statutory power, assigned to the respondents, in enlargement of their holdings, certain lands then occupied by the complainer. The complainer thinking himself aggrieved by the action of the Commissioners, raised a suspension of their proceedings, and averred that the order or interlocutor of the Commissioners was ultra vires. On 4th June 1890 I refused the complainer's note of suspension, and that judgment was affirmed by the First Division of the Court on 11th July 1890. During the dependence of that suspension the complainer sowed the land assigned to the respondents with the necessary seeds for crop 1890, consisting of bere, turnips, potatoes, and hay.

"It is unnecessary to detail the subsequent litigation which took place between the parties. The question now is, To whom do the crops belong? The respondents claim the crops on the ground (1) that they have the sole right and title

Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886 (Act 49 and 50 Vict. cap. 29)—Enlargement of holdings—Entry to assigned lands.—In April 1889, by order of the Crofter Commissioners, certain lands—part of a farm held under a lease dated subsequently to the passing of the Crofters Act, 1886—were assigned to certain crofters for the enlargement of their holdings. The landlord and tenant of the farm thereafter brought a suspension and interdict to have the crofters interdicted from entering upon the assigned lands, on the ground that they had no title, not having obtained decree conform to the order from the Sheriff in terms of the Act, and obtained interim interdict. After certain procedure decree conform was pronounced on 3d March 1890, and the interim interdict was recalled. A second note of suspension and interdict against entering the lands was thereafter brought by the landlord and tenant on the ground that the order and all that had followed upon it was ultra vires of the Commissioners, the farm being held under the above lease. In July 1890 the reasons of suspension were repelled. Meantime the tenant had sowed the assigned lands with the necessary seeds for crop 1890. In August 1890 the crofters obtained a decree of ejection against the tenant, and claimed right to the crop sown.

In a suspension by the tenant the Court held that in the circumstances the tenant had a right to sow the crop, and that the crop so sown by him belonged exclusively to him.

Question, whether the crofters might have a right to the profits of the crop.

THIS was a sequel to the case of Traill's Trustees v. Grieve, reported ante, July 11, 1890, 17 R. 1115. 1ST DIVISION. Lord Trayner. C.

By order, dated 24th April 1889, the Crofter Commissioners assigned certain subjects, amounting to 65 acres arable land, and 22 acres pasture, forming portion of the farm of Elsness, Orkney, then occupied by Mr James Swanson, as agricultural tenant, under the trustees of Mr J. C. Traill of Rattar, the proprietor, to John Grieve and others, crofters, in enlargement of their holdings, with possession at 11th November following.

The proprietor and tenant in November following brought a suspension and interdict in the Sheriff Court to have the crofters prevented from taking possession on the ground that decree conform had not been obtained from the Sheriff under the 28th section of the Crofters Holdings Act, 1886. Interim interdict was granted, and after certain procedure both in the Court of Session and in the Sheriff Court, decree conform was pronounced by the Sheriff-substitute on 3d March 1890, and the interim interdict was recalled.

On 13th March 1890 the proprietor and tenant presented a second note of suspension and interdict, praying the Court to suspend the order of the Commissioners and the decree following on it, on the ground that they were ultra vires of the Commissioners. The note was refused by the Lord Ordinary (Trayner) on 4th June 1890, and a reclaiming note against his Lordship's interlocutor was refused by the First Division, as reported ante, July 11, 1890, 17 R. 1115. In August 1890 the crofters obtained decree of ejection against the tenant in the Sheriff Court.

Meantime Mr Swanson, the tenant, had sown the necessary seeds for the Sheriff for decree conform, which alone could give them a legal title to enter. In consequence, a suspension and interdict was brought to prevent their doing so—the ground of suspension being that the respondents had failed to obtain the decree conform, and the objection—being the only objection which was insisted on—was removed when, pendente processu, the necessary decree was obtained. The plea of mala fides, which was the prominent question argued in this discussion, was largely founded upon the contention that the landlord and tenant might have raised in the first suspension the other objections to the order of the Crofter Commissioners which were subsequently raised in the second suspension. I shall consider that question afterwards, but meantime I may say that when a party litigant has one good objection to a proceeding of this kind he is well entitled to make it, and to have effect given to it. That is all that was done. But the objection founded upon the want of the decree conform having been removed, another suspension was brought, in which the proceedings of the Crofter Commissioners were complained of as being ultra vires, and beyond their statutory powers. That question gave rise to a lengthened discussion and was decided by this Division of the Court in July last. The question was one certainly not unattended with difficulty; indeed, it appeared to me to be one of considerable nicety and importance, and although ultimately, upon a examination of the matter, I came to think that the Crofter Commissioners had not exceeded their powers, it still appeared to me that the proceedings had placed both the landlord and tenant in a position of great embarrassment. I came to be of that opinion because the Crofters Act seemed to take no interest in, and to be absolutely silent in regard to any provisions for adjusting or regulating the relations of the original proprietor and tenant of the lands, a slice of which was to be given to the crofter. I cannot accordingly say that the case was a very clear one; it was rather one which any person who was interested was entitled to have seriously considered and decided; and, therefore, so far as this point is concerned, I am not disposed to think that either landlord or tenant was in mala fide in litigating it, the effect of the litigation being to suspend the order of the Commissioners. It therefore follows that the crofters who were prevented from getting possession of the subjects are not now entitled to say that they have been treated in any spirit of vindictiveness, or ill-will, or mala fides.

I have made these observations as negativing the existence of mala fides on the part of Mr Swanson, but I must guard myself by saying that I am not satisfied that the present question turns upon the existence or non-existence of mala fides. It rather appears to me that until the decision of July 1890 the landlord and tenant had no alternative but to continue the state of possession as it previously existed. If the portion of the farm which had been assigned to the crofters had been left uncultivated by the tenant, the landlord could not in the circumstances have been disabled from claiming rent, or, at least, the tenant might have rendered himself subject to an action for failing to cultivate it. Mala fides is nothing but a state of feeling, and I think the position of the landlord and tenant was such that, pending the litigation, they had no course to follow except that which they took.

That being so, what is the ground of the Lord Ordinary's judgment? Pending the litigation, there were three positions in which the farm might have been placed. In the first place, it might have been left uncultivated, an alternative which is not to be entertained after what has been said. In the second place, it might have been handed over to the crofters, an alternative which quite inconsistent with the pleas of the complainers in the second suspension, and would virtually have amounted to a surrender of the position which the proprietor had taken up. The third alternative was the one which was adopted, that the tenant should continue to cultivate his holding under the lease until the question at issue was finally decided. In adopting this alternative, I think the parties acted rightly, the landlord and tenant were bound to one another—mutually bound to one another—to continue the state of possession so long as the litigation lasted. The Lord Ordinary has accordingly held, and I think rightly, that the crop raised during the interval caused by the litigation—the crop of 1889-90—cannot belong to the crofters. They did not sow it, nor did they labour the ground, and they had no concern with any part of the work necessary to produce the crop.

There may be a further question, how far the crofters who have been found in the end to be right, and who ought to have been in possession of the farm, may not be entitled to the profits of the crop which was sown by Mr Swanson. There is nothing upon this record to raise such a question, which is one of difficulty, and involving some little embarrassment on a ground which has been suggested by Mr Jameson, that, in his view, it will be necessary to deduct the value of the labour, because if his clients had been in possession they would probably have themselves in person laboured the ground, and would not have hired others to do so as the tenant did. But there is no averment upon this matter on record, and in regard to the only question there raised, I agree with the result at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived.

LORD ADAM.—The sole question which we have to decide is whether the respondents have a right to the crops grown during the season 1889-90 on certain parts of the farm of Elsness, which by an order of the Crofter Commissioners, dated 24th April 1889, were assigned for the enlargement of the respondents' holdings. The ground upon which the complainer claims the crop is that it was he who sowed it. The respondents, on the other hand, say that the land upon which it was sown was theirs. Both parties have argued the case as if it turned upon the question whether there was or was not mala fides on the part of the complainer. It was not disputed on the one hand by the respondents that if the crop was sown in bona fide, then the general rule superficies cedit sementem sequitur applies. It was not, on the other hand, disputed by the complainer that, if the crop was sown in mala fide, then the brocard in question would not apply.

I have a doubt along with your Lordship whether that is the ground upon which the complainer is entitled to defend his rights. But I take the case upon that footing. The order of the Crofter Commissioners was pronounced on the 24th April 1889. A suspension and interdict was brought in November 1889 by Mr Swanson to have the respondents prevented from entering into possession of the subjects assigned to them until they should obtain decree conform giving them an active title to do so. Mr Swanson's position in that suspension was ultimately admitted by the respondents to be sound, and upon 31 March 1890 decree conform was, on their application, pronounced by the Sheriff-substitute. Accordingly, down to that date, there was no mala fides, and no reason why Mr Swanson should not have sown the land as usual. That objection to the respondents' title was, however, cured by the order being registered, as I have said.

Swanson v. Grieve.

Then arose another question under a second suspension which was brought on the ground that the order of the Crofter Commissioners was ultra vires. It was presented on 13th March last, and the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor refusing it was affirmed by this Division of the Court on 11th July following. It is needless to say that the crops were sown during the progress of the litigation, and the question comes to be, was the complainer in mala fide when he so sowed the crops? Mala fides necessarily implies an improper state of mind on the part of the person with regard to whom the allegation is made. But the respondents' averment in the suspension does not set forth any mala fides on the part of Mr Swanson. The averment is,—"It is believed and averred that the complainer, so far from sowing the crops referred to in good faith, refused to sow said crops on the land which had been assigned to the respondents, in respect he had no longer any right to continue in possession of said land, and that he at last consented to do so only after peremptory orders had been given him to that effect by the proprietors, who at the same time undertook to relieve him of all loss he might suffer thereby." If it had been averred that Mr Swanson and his landlord had acted in concert, and had sown the crops in pursuance of a scheme to defeat the legal rights of the respondents, it might have been different; but where the tenant was perfectly willing to renounce possession and the landlord insisted on his sowing a crop in order to retain it, I do not think that such a course can be said to amount to mala fides on his part. I think the crop was sown in perfect bona fides.

There may be questions behind which are not raised in this record, and which are not now decided, as to whether in an action of damages, or in any other action that may be brought by the respondents, they would be entitled to the profits of the crop. Upon that matter I say nothing.

whole, it was conditional on the wife's survivance. It bore to be granted for the love, favour, and affection the granter had for his wife, not for her heirs. The cause of granting having disappeared, the deed was no longer effectual.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The deceased Gavin Allan in 1859 had a settlement prepared by Mr Torrance, writer, which proceeded on the narrative that it was a duty incumbent on him to settle his affairs in case of his death. He accordingly settled his affairs in one bequest, and "for the love, favour, and affection I have and bear to Elizabeth Cleland or Allan, my spouse, assigned and disponed to her, her heirs, executors, and assignees whomsoever, heritably and irredeemably," certain heritable property, and generally his whole estate and effects, heritable and moveable, real and personal, and appointed her his executrix. He was predeceased by his wife, Elizabeth Allan, and married afterwards a second wife, Margaret Smith or Allan. In 1889 he died survived by his second wife. His will remained unaltered at his death.

The question which we have to decide is whether this deed of settlement was a provision in favour of his first wife and fell when she predeceased her husband, or a bequest to her and her heirs which remained effectual after her death.

The question seems easy enough in itself. We must look to the terms of the deed of settlement. When I look at the deed, I am of opinion that it is not of the nature of a provision but a settlement by the deceased of his affairs with the intention definitely expressed that all is to go to his wife and her heirs. There is nothing in the deed to shew that that was not what he intended. The preliminary narrative points to a general settlement of his affairs, and there is nothing in the deed to militate against his having made such a settlement. He left this deed behind him at his death. He never cancelled it. It never seems to have entered into his mind after making the deed that he still had a duty incumbent on him to settle his affairs.

Taking that view of the case, I think it falls under Halliburton, 11 R. 979. In that case a truster in his trust-settlement directed his trustees to convey the residue of his estate to Barbara Halliburton, his youngest daughter, and her heirs and assignees, and the grantee having predeceased the truster it was held on the death of the truster that the heirs of the daughter, who had predeceased, were entitled to succeed. In the case of Findlay v. Mackenzie, 2 R. 909, the intention to make a provision for his widow was expressed by the testator in the deed, and the Lord President in his opinion in the case of Halliburton specially distinguished it from Findlay v. Mackenzie.

Here there being no children of the marriage, it was quite natural that the husband should leave all his property to his wife and her heirs. It is not for us to inquire into the reason why he preferred his first wife's heirs to his own. That matter was entirely in his own hands. According to the terms of this deed, it was a settlement of his affairs. The presumption is, that having made such a settlement, and having left it uncancelled, he intended to adhere to it. I think therefore that we should decide this case by answering the first question in the affirmative and the second in the negative.

LORD YOUNG.—I concur, but not without some misgiving whether, if the testator were alive, he would answer the questions as proposed.

The case deals only with heritage, consisting of a house. There seems to have and I hereby nominate and appoint the said Elizabeth Cleland or Allan to be my executrix and universal legatrix, ... declaring always that the said Elizabeth Cleland or Allan shall be bound and obliged, by acceptance hereof she binds and obliges herself, out of my said estate and effects above conveyed, to make payment of all my just and lawful debts, deathbed and funeral expenses."

Mrs Allan died without issue on 20th March 1884, and on 21st August 1884 Gavin Allan married again, his second wife being Margaret Smith or Allan. He died at Motherwell on 16th December 1889, without issue by either marriage, but survived by his second wife, who was appointed his executrix-dative qua relict.

Gavin Allan's whole heritable estate consisted at his death of heritable property, which was valued at about £1200. The free moveable estate left by him amounted to £200.

The widow claimed her legal rights in the estate.

Questions having arisen as to the person entitled to succeed to the heritable property, this special case was presented for the opinion and judgment of the Court. The heir-at-law of Elizabeth Cleland or Allan was the first party, and the heir-at-law of Gavin Allan was the second party thereto.

The first party, as heir of Elizabeth Cleland or Allan, claimed the heritable property, subject to the widow's terce, as conditional institute under the said disposition and settlement. The second party claimed the heritable property, subject to the said burden of terce, as the heir-at-law of Gavin Allan, maintaining that the said disposition and settlement was evacuated by the predecease of Elizabeth Cleland or Allan, and that Gavin Allan died intestate.

The following questions at law were submitted to the Court:—"(1) Is the first party, as heir of Elizabeth Cleland or Allan, entitled to the said heritable property left by the deceased Gavin Allan, subject to the widow's terce, as conditional institute under the said disposition and settlement? (2) Is the second party entitled to it, as heir-at-law of the deceased Gavin Allan, in consequence of the said disposition and settlement having been evacuated by the predecease of the said Elizabeth Cleland or Allan, it having been conditional on her surviving her husband, and that he thus died intestate?"

Argued for the first party;—This deed was preserved by Mr Allan and was never revoked by him. This shewed that he intended it should take effect. The testator passed over his own heirs and gave everything to his first wife and her heirs. The disposition constituted Mrs Elizabeth Allan's heirs conditional institutes in the event of her decease. The case of Findlay v. Mackenzie[1] did not apply, as the disposition in that case expressly bore to be granted as a provision to a wife in the event of her survivance.[2]

Argued for the second party;—This deed was a provision in favour of the granter's wife. This case exactly resembled that of Findlay, and in his opinion in Halliburton the Lord President excepted cases resembling that of Findlay. The general rule to be gathered from these decisions was that where a deed was of the nature of a postnuptial marriage-contract in which a husband granted a provision to his wife in implement of no legal obligation, the presumption was that the disposition was effectual only in the event of the wife's survivance. If the deed was looked at been some moveable estate, but no question is raised about that. The decease left a disposition of this heritage executed nearly thirty years before his deat It was an ordinary disposition conveying the estate to Elizabeth Allan a her heirs. Elizabeth Allan died in 1884. Her husband survived her for fi years, and at his death that disposition of the house was found in his repositori and no other.

The question therefore is shortly this,—Is that disposition to have effect? cannot find any sufficient ground in law for denying that it should. The hou remained the property of the husband till his death. When Elizabeth All died, he continued at liberty to deal with the house as he pleased. He did n deal with it except by this disposition to her and her heirs. Her heirs na claim it. In the circumstances, I see no reason for refusing their claim.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

LORD TRAYNER.—Both during the discussion and since I have had doubt to whether this deed could be regarded except as a provision in favour of t wife. This doubt has induced considerable hesitancy in my mind at arriving a conclusion. But a careful consideration of the facts of the present case, an the two cases referred to by your Lordship in the chair, has convinced me tha the view of the law taken by your Lordships is the one established by the de cisions.

THE COURT answered the first question put in the case in the affirma tive, and found and declared accordingly.

Cunningham's Trustees v. Cunningham.

In his codicil he provided,—" . . . . . I wish the residue or mainder of my estate to be sold & the proceeds to be equally divided nongst all my relatives, my sister Maria to get a half more than the hers."

The truster had had four sisters and two brothers. All these predeased him save Maria. They all, however, left children. The eldest other left an only child, John; the second brother left six children, of om Dr John Cunningham was one.

A multiplepoinding having been raised in name of the trustees for tribution of the residue, claims were lodged, inter alia, (1) for John unningham, who claimed on the footing that the division of the estate ould be among the sister and the nephews and nieces per stirpes, and) for Dr John Cunningham, who claimed on the footing of a division ong these persons per capita.

The Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy), on 15th July 1890, found that the whole idue fell "to be divided per stirpes among the testator's brothers and ters and their descendants, in the same manner as if he had died testate, but subject always to his sister Maria receiving one-half share re than the share falling to each of the other stirpes," &c.

Dr John Cunningham reclaimed, and argued;—The trust-settlement ust be read as if the testator had said, "First find out who my relatives e." Now, the clue to that was supplied by the case of Williamson,[1] here a bequest in similar terms was held to point to heirs in mobilibus, according to the Intestate Moveable Succession Act of 1855. Then, recurring to the truster's directions, the trustees found themselves instructed to divide "equally" among these persons. To divide per stirpes would let in an infinite diversity among the favoured individuals. In a similar destination of a husband's and wife's property to their "nearest of in" the sister of the wife and the nieces of the husband had all been mitted to share equally.[2] Again, the præcipuum given to Maria was telligible if she was thereby to be placed on a higher level than her phews and nieces. It was not so intelligible, however, that one sister ould be preferred before other sisters and brothers.

John Cunningham argued;—In the will itself the testator took the families" as the objects of his bounty, i.e., the stirpes. By the codicil e desired to recall the inequality of distribution among these stirpes, but here was no indication of any intention to disturb the method of division. he reclaimer appealed to the case of Williamson as giving the rule. Esto. What was the result? The adoption of the rules of the Intestate Moveble Succession Act, by which the representatives came in place of those hom they represented, each family taking what its head would have aken. The reclaimer, again, emphasised the word "equal," but there was o intention to disturb the equality. The problem always was amongst hom the equality was to have place, the kin in the first degree or those n the second. There were many cases where kindred in two different legrees were called, and the distribution was to be equal, but yet the present question had to be settled.[3] raised in this case relates to the disposal of the residue of his estate by th codicil, by which that residue is directed "to be equally divided amongst all m relatives, my sister Maria to get a half more than the others."

It is contended, on the one hand, that by this direction the testator favour equally all those who were legally his heirs in mobilibus; that the estate mu be divided into twice as many shares as there are heirs in mobilibus and o share more; and that his sister Maria must receive three shares and each of t other persons two shares. On the other hand, it is contended that the true co struction is that the testator intended by the expression "my relatives" h brothers and sisters, or the direct descendants of those who should predece him, the latter taking their parents' share.

There is considerable difficulty in finding grounds in the words of the codi for either construction, but I have come to the conclusion that the construct adopted by the Lord Ordinary is the right one. I think that that is the co clusion I should have arrived at had there been no other words than the "amongst all my relatives." The deceased was making a family settlement which he was acting as in loco parentis to the rest of his family, and it wo be, I think, an unnatural construction to put upon the words he used to g them a meaning which would cause the shares of his brothers and sisters w might survive him to have a proportion carved out of them whenever a brot or sister should die, leaving a number of children. Such a reading would think, be strained and unnatural. But the special favour shewn to "my si Maria," that she was to get "a half more than the others," seems to me to in cate very plainly that, in speaking of his relations, he was speaking of a di sion among them in equal shares to each family, and not in equal shares to e individual, whether brother, sister, nephew, or niece, who might survive hi move your Lordships, therefore, to adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocut

Wood v. Cranston & Elliot.

A debtor was on 7th February made notour bankrupt by the expiration without payment of the days of charge upon a decree for payment. On 21st May the creditor poinded his goods, and on 27th May carried through a sale thereof. On 20th June, being more than four months after the first constitution of notour bankruptcy, another creditor, founding on liquid grounds of debt, claimed to be ranked pari passu with the poinding creditor on the proceeds of the sale, on the ground that a second notour bankruptcy had been created by the execution of the poinding on 21st May.

Held that notour bankruptcy having been once constituted on 7th February, the subsequent poinding could not be founded on as a constitution of bankruptcy.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of the Lothians and Peebles.

On 27th January 1890 George Wood, butcher, Edinburgh, obtained a decree for payment of a sum of money in the Debts Recovery Court, Edinburgh, against Samuel Calcraft. A charge was given upon this decree which expired upon 7th February 1890 without payment. Calcraft being insolvent at the time was thus rendered notour bankrupt in virtue of the Debtors Act, 1880.*

On 21st May 1890 Wood executed a poinding under the decree, and on 27th May Calcraft's effects were sold thereunder. The sum realised was £37, 1s. 10d.

Cranston & Elliot, Edinburgh, were also creditors of Calcraft. They desired to rank pari passu with Wood on the sum of £37, 1s. 10d., and in June 1890 they raised, in the name of Wood, an action of multiplepoinding in which Calcraft and his other creditors were called.

They stated that at the date of the poinding Calcraft, the common debtor, was notour bankrupt, that they were creditors "holding liquid grounds of debt against the said common debtor, and on 20th June 1890 have produced the same in this process within sixty days of the date of said poinding; and, at all events, within four months thereafter, and within four months after the constitution of the notour bankruptcy of the common debtor."

They pleaded;—The common debtor being notour bankrupt, and the claimants having produced liquid grounds of debt, they are entitled to a share of the free proceeds of the sale of the common debtor's effects in terms of section 12 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856.†

Wood, the nominal raiser, objected to the real raisers obtaining a pari passu ranking. He averred that the common debtor was rendered notour bankrupt on 7th February by the expiration of the charge on his decree without payment, the common debtor being then insolvent, and he explained that the proceeds of the sale had been paid to him in virtue of that diligence as regularly carried through, and that he was not debtor to

Wood pleaded;—(1) The real raisers' whole material averments a irrelevant. (2) The nominal raiser having no funds belonging to t common debtor in his hands, the present action is incompetent. (3) T real raisers and claimants not having, within four months after the co stitution of the common debtor's notour bankruptcy, judicially produc liquid grounds of debt or decree of payment in any process relative to t subject of the poinding, and not having been, within said period, in a po tion to arrest or poind the estate of the common debtor, they are n entitled to a pari passu ranking with the nominal raiser on the proce of the sale carried through by him.

On 21st July 1890 the Sheriff-substitute (Hamilton) pronounced th interlocutor:—"Repels the defences for George Dick Wood, the nomin raiser; sustains the competency of the multiplepoinding," and appoint Wood to consign the fund. *

Wood appealed to the Sheriff (Crichton), who on 23d October adhered

Wood appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—The noto bankruptcy was constituted on 7th February by the charge given h him expiring without payment,‡ and Cranston & Elliot did not prod liquid grounds of debt within four months from that date. The She had held that the mere carrying out of the poinding rendered the comm debtor notour bankrupt a second time on 27th May. If this view we correct, then each successive step of diligence would render a man noto bankrupt over again ad infinitum. What the Debtors Act, 1880, sec. did, was to introduce a new mode of constituting notour bankruptcy, whi had to be read into the Bankruptcy Act of 1856. When notour ban ruptcy was once constituted, its effects were always the same.[1]

* "NOTE.—It appears that the common debtor was rendered notour bankr on 7th February last, on which day the charge given on the nominal rais decree expired without payment (Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880, section 6). was again rendered notour bankrupt on 27th May, when a sale was carr through, under the poinding executed by the nominal raiser (Bankruptcy (Sc land) Act, 1856, section 7 (b), see also section 9). As the real raisers and cl claimants have produced liquid grounds of debt in this action, within four mo of the latter date—(Bankruptcy Act, 1856, section 12)—it is thought that th are entitled to be ranked on the fund in medio pari passu with the nomi raiser—in other words, that the competency and relevancy of the action must sustained."

† "NOTE.—(After quoting section 12 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, als given)—In the present case the real raisers and other claimants have p duced grounds of debt within four months of the date of the poinding. it is contended on the part of the poinding creditor and nominal raiser th by the Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880, section 6, the common debtor w rendered notour bankrupt on 7th February by the expiry of the charge gi him, and that the four months must count from that date. Wood v. Cranston & Elliot.

Argued for Cranston & Elliot;—The effect of the poinding was to make Wood notour bankrupt afresh on 27th May. Section 9 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, specially contemplated a second notour bankruptcy being constituted before the termination of the first—(quoted in footnote, supra, p. 382). Section 6 of the Debtors Act, 1880, was not intended to interfere in any way with the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act of 1856. The only notour bankruptcy here to which section 12 of the Act of 1856 could apply was that constituted by the poinding and sale on 27th May, and as the claimants had produced liquid grounds of debt within four months thereafter, they were entitled to a pari passu ranking.[1]

At advising,—

LORD TRAYNER.—The appellant in this case obtained a decree against his debtor Calcraft in January 1890 upon which a charge of payment was given. That charge expired on 7th February following without payment having been made. The appellant's decree being one on which, but for the provisions of the Debtors Act, 1880, he could have operated personal diligence, the lapsing of the charge without payment constituted notour bankruptcy against the debtor. Following up his charge, the appellant poinded the goods of his debtor and carried through a sale thereof in the month of May. The respondents, who are also creditors of Calcraft, claim to rank pari passu with the appellant on the proceeds of the sale on the ground that they have within four months from the constitution of the debtor's notour bankruptcy judicially produced a liquid ground of debt against the debtor, as provided by section 12 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856. The judicial production by the respondents of their liquid ground of debt on which their claim is based is said, by them, to have been made on 20th June. From this statement of the facts it appears to be clear enough that the respondents' claim cannot be sustained if the notour bankruptcy of the debtor Calcraft constituted on 7th February is taken as the terminus from which the four months are to be computed. Accordingly the respondents maintain that notour bankruptcy was again constituted against Calcraft in the month of May by the poinding which was then executed of his goods by the appellant, and that they are entitled to the pari passu ranking which they claim, as having produced this liquid ground of debt within four months of that date. This is the view which the Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute have taken, but I think it is not a sound view of the law.

The 12th section of the Act of 1856 appears to me to contemplate and to deal with one constitution of notour bankruptcy, and one only. From the date of that constitution the sixty days before and the four months thereafter are to be reckoned. If it was not so, then creditors who did diligence within four months after the second or third or fourth constitution of notour bankruptcy would all be entitled to rank pari passu with those who had done diligence within four months of the first constitution, which would result in this, that creditors would rank pari passu who had done diligence within sixteen months after the constitution of notour bankruptcy, a result not provided for by the statute. In the present case notour bankruptcy was constituted, in my opinion, on 7th February, when the charge of payment given by the appellant expired. The subsequent poinding was not a constitution of notour bankruptcy, but merely an ordinary step in the course of following up the diligence already commenced.

Wood v. Cranston & Elliot.

No doubt a poinding following upon an expired charge is in itself a mode of constituting notour bankruptcy, but it was not in this case the constitution of notour bankruptcy against his debtor by the appellant, for that had already been done. As regards his notour bankruptcy, the poinding executed by the appellant did not affect the debtor's position; he was neither more nor less notour bankrupt after the poinding than before it. I do not think the respondents can take any benefit from the provisions of section 9 of the Act of 1856. It is there provided that notour bankruptcy being once constituted shall continue in the case of a sequestration until the debtor is discharged, and in other cases until insolvency ceases "without prejudice to notour bankruptcy being anew constituted within such period." If I read that clause alone, and apart from the other sections of the statute, I should have some difficulty in understanding the purpose of its concluding proviso. If notour bankruptcy once constituted is to continue in a sequestration till the debtor's discharge, and in other cases till insolvency ceases, there would appear to be no room—and indeed no reason—for providing that during that period notour bankruptcy might be constituted anew. But the difficulty disappears, and the importance and value of this provision becomes clear, when the terms of the 15th section are taken into account. I think the renewed constitution of notour bankruptcy provided for by section 9 has reference to an application for sequestration, and has no bearing or effect upon the question of the equalisation of diligence.

I am of opinion that the interlocutor appealed against should be recalled.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I have had great difficulty in this case. The result at which the Sheriff has arrived is indeed a most anomalous one, but the question was put whether this was not the inevitable consequence of the language of the statute. Lord Trayner's explanation is however a possible one, and, though with considerable difficulty, I concur.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I concur.

LORD YOUNG was absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds in fact that Samuel Calcraft, the common debtor, was rendered notour bankrupt on 7th February 1890 by the expiry, without payment of the charge given him upon the appellant's decree; that a poinding of the common debtor's effects was executed at the instance of the appellant on 21st May 1890; that a sale of the poinded effects was carried through on 27th May 1890; and that the respondents and claimants produced in the process decree of payment, or other liquid grounds of debt, on 20th June 1890: Find in law that the respondents are not entitled to a pari passu ranking with the appellant on the proceeds of the sale carried through by him: Therefore sustain the appeal, recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff appealed against, and assoilzie the nominal raiser and appellant from the conclusions of the petition, and decern," &c.

Succession—Heritable and Moveable—Jus relictæ—Heritable security—Titles to Lands Consolidation Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 101), sec. 117.—A testatrix directed her trustees "to hold, apply, pay, and convey the whole residue" of her estate for behoof of her three children. The trustees had a power to sell heritage, and to call up investments. One of the sons, who survived his mother, died after the residue had been divided with the exception of a heritable bond for £1500 which belonged to the deceased testatrix. In a question between the son's widow and daughter, held that the son's right in the bond was a moveable jus crediti, and was subject to jus relictæ.

2D DIVISION. M.

ELLEN M'GRATH OR GILLIGAN died in 1884, leaving three children, William Robert Gilligan, Archibald Gilligan, and Susan Gilligan. By her trust-disposition and settlement she directed her trustees to "hold, apply, pay, and convey" the whole residue of her means and estate among these three children. The deed bore further, "I hereby authorise my trustees" to sell the trust-estate, heritable and moveable, and to invest the funds in the purchase or on the security of heritable property.

Part of Mrs Gilligan's estate was a heritable bond for £2000 over property in Calton, Glasgow. The trustees received £500 to account, and reduced the bond to £1500.

William Robert Gilligan died intestate in 1888. He was survived by his wife and by one child, Wilhelmina Gilligan, who was in pupillarity.

Thomas M'Lelland, writer, was appointed judicial factor on the intestate estate of William Robert Gilligan. At the time of his death W. R. Gilligan had not obtained from Mrs Gilligan's trustees the one-third of the £1500 in the bond which fell to him. After his death, however, the trustees assigned the £1500 in favour of M'Lelland, as judicial factor on his intestate estate, and Archibald and Susan Gilligan in equal proportions.

A question arose in the course of M'Lelland's administration of the intestate estate as to the manner in which this sum of £500 fell to be apportioned between Mrs W. R. Gilligan and Wilhelmina Gilligan. A special case was stated for the opinion of the Court upon the following question of law:—"Whether the widow of the said William Robert Gilligan is entitled to jus relictæ or terce, or either and which of them, out of the said sum of £500?"

The first party was Mr Henry Taylor, who was appointed curator ad litem to Wilhelmina Gilligan. The second party was Mrs W. R. Gilligan.

The first party maintained that in the persons of the trustees of Mrs Gilligan senior the bond was heritable; that they in the exercise of their trust, though they had power to convert it, retained it; that the sum of £500 must be dealt with as if directly secured to W. R. Gilligan under a bond and disposition in security; and that in that view no right in it, unless perhaps terce, pertained to Mrs W. R. Gilligan, his widow. Section 117 of the Act of 1868 * made heritable securities moveable only in cases of intestate succession.[1] Alternatively, on the footing th Gilligan was not to be regarded as creditor therein at the time of l the first party maintained that it was still heritable in any quest his succession, and that Mrs W. R. Gilligan had no claim to any it jure relictæ.

* The Titles to Lands Consolidation Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 101), enacts, sec. 117, that from and after the date of that Act heritable securities shall, except as therein provided, "be moveable as regards the succession of the creditor, . . . provided that all heritable securities shall continue, and shall be heritable . . . as regards all rights of courtesy and terce competent to the husband or wife of any such creditor."

The second party maintained that W. R. Gilligan, her husband creditor in the heritable bond, but had merely a claim to the sum as part of the residue of his mother's trust-estate, which claim w able, and subject to the second party's jus relictæ.[2]

At advising,—

LORD YOUNG.—This case is between a mother and her only child, a and it regards one-third of a sum of £500. The question is whether third part of £500 is to go to the mother or to go to the daughter. T claims it as part of her jus relictæ out of her deceased husband's estat is an alternative claim by her to terce out of the £500. The £50 of so much of the deceased husband's deceased mother's estate s entitled to at the time of his death. He survived his mother, and p estate consisted of a bond for £2000 heritably secured. She left a tru tion and settlement directing her trustees to pay, divide, and make estate equally among her children, of whom there were three, the husband of one of the parties before us and the father of the other of them. The trustees had complete power to sell any part of the and authority to uplift any investment which stood at the death of th This particular investment of £2000 they did uplift, but only to the one-fourth, leaving £1500 of the trust money standing upon it; and third of that remainder which they left standing upon this heritable the £500 to which I have alluded.

The widow is entitled to jus relictæ out of the £500 or not accord husband's right and interest in so much of his deceased mother's estate will was heritable or moveable. I cannot say that the question is u with difficulty. There is a great deal to be said in support of the vie was heritable, and that the trustees left the estate as they got it from th in this heritable form to the extent of £1500. But upon the whole ma the best consideration I have been able to give to the matter, I think was moveable. I think the trustees uplifted the £500 as they m uplifted the whole, and that the £1500 which they left was just an in of the trust-estate, and that the right of the deceased husband and t a personal right to the one-third of that £1500, just as part of the e was only part of it,—that is to say, £500. The result of that is that th is entitled to one-third of it, and that the residue of two-thirds go daughter.

I think we should answer the question by saying that the mother i to jus relictæ out of the £500. I do not take any account—I have tioned it because I think it is of no account—that in the end by arr the trustees transferred to the beneficiaries this heritable security, as it standing, to the extent of the £1500. That was by arrangement and prejudice to any legal rights.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the estate of the truster was by the operation of the recent statute wholly moveable, and that the son as a beneficiary under the trust had merely a moveable jus crediti. He was not entitled to any share of the heritable bond. His right was to a certain share of a moveable estate. His claim being a moveable jus crediti, his widow is entitled to one-third as her jus relictæ.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Kinnear. C.

MR ROBERT CRAIG, papermaker, Craigesk, was a shareholder in the City of Glasgow Bank, and on the bank going into liquidation in October 1878 he was placed on the list of contributories as a holder of £20,467 of stock, involving a liability of £562,842, or thereby. He was wholly unable to meet the calls, and accordingly made over his whole estate to the liquidators. His estate embraced, inter alia, 250 original shares of £10 each of the General Property Investment Company, on which £2 per share was paid up, and on which a further call of £2 per share had been intimated and was due in December 1878. It was arranged between him and the liquidators of the bank that he should realise such portion of his means as could be disposed of, and account for the proceeds, and that the liquidators should get an assignation to the remainder. Accordingly, in answer to an inquiry made in March 1879, as to how the shares in question could be best disposed of, the secretaries of the company suggested that Mr Craig should give up his shares, which, with the assent of the liquidators of the bank, Mr Craig agreed to do.

The following transfer was accordingly executed on 14th April 1879, and accepted by the company on 5th June following:—"I, Robert Craig, . . . in consideration of my being hereby relieved of liability for the uncalled portion of the share capital of the General Property Investment Company, Limited, in respect of the shares after mentioned, and without any price or consideration having been paid to me by the General Property Investment Company, Limited, hereinafter called the said transferees, do hereby assign and transfer to the said transferees 250 shares of £10 each, . . . of and in the undertaking called the General Property Investment Company, Limited, to hold unto the said transferees and assigns, subject to the several conditions on which I held the same immediately before the execution hereof; and we, the said transferees do hereby agree to accept and take the said shares subject to the conditions aforesaid."

In 1886 the Investment Company became insolvent, and an order for its winding-up was pronounced by the Court, Mr David Myles being appointed liquidator.

In 1889 the Investment Company and its liquidator brought an action against Mr Craig, which concluded for reduction of the transfer and of all entries in the share register and other books of the company giving effect to the transfer, and, further, for payment of a sum of £1533, being the amount of calls on the shares so transferred, less the amount paid on 108 of the shares which were reissued by the company.

The pursuers averred that the company had no power under its memorandum of association to purchase its own shares; that the transfer and entries following upon it were illegal and void under the Companies Acts, 1862 and 1867; and that it was ultra vires of the directors of the company to accept or register them.

The defender in answer averred that the transfer was made by him and accepted by the company in consequence of his inability to meet the call due on 24th December 1878, and that it was truly a surrender or forfeiture of his shares to the company with a view to the benefit of the company. "No price or consideration was paid to the defender by the company in respect of the said transfer or surrender, and it was such a transfer or surrender as is contemplated by the Companies Acts and the articles of association of the company. The capital in possession of the company was not thereby diminished to any extent. Its purpose and effect was to enable the company to reissue the shares so surrendered and to substitute a solvent for an insolvent shareholder. Moreover, the said surrender was made by the defender with the approval and in the interests of the liquidators of the bank, and if the company had not accepted the said transfer the liquidators" of the bank "would have relieved the defender, as they were bound to do, of all liability in connection with the said shares. The bank, however, has now been dissolved, and the liquidators discharged, and the defender may therefore be precluded from claiming relief from them."

He further stated;—(Stat. 2) "The company, and the directors and all the shareholders, have, since June 1879, refused to recognise the defender as a shareholder, and have adopted, homologated, and acquiesced in the said transfer, or surrender, or forfeiture, in the full knowledge of the whole circumstances. They have treated the shares as the property of the company and in their hands for re-issue. Accordingly, the company, accepting the shares on this footing, and treating them as forfeited or surrendered, have re-issued 108 thereof to existing shareholders, and have made and recovered calls from them in respect thereof. Since June 1879 the defender has not been entered in the register of shareholders, or in any of the books of the company, or in the statutory returns made to the registrar, as owner of the said shares. On the contrary, the company and their transferees have been so entered. This was all along well known to all the shareholders and creditors of the company. It was also all along, from at least June 1879, known, or otherwise ought to have been known, to all the shareholders and creditors of the company that the company had accepted the foresaid surrender, and had re-issued a portion of the shares so surrendered, and they acquiesced in and adopted the same." The defender had never had any intimation of calls or of any of the meetings of the company subsequent to the date of the transfer, and no claim had ever been made upon him in connection with the shares until February 1888. It was also, he stated, impossible for the pursuer to make restitution in integrum in the event of the transfer being reduced.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—1. The pretended transfer of shares by the defender to the company condescended on, and relative entries in the books of the company, being illegal and void, and inconsistent with, and in violation of, the Companies Acts, 1862 and 1867—(a) the said transfer and entries should be reduced as concluded for; and (b) decree should be pronounced in terms of the petitory conclusions of the summons.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—2. The transfer sought to be impugned having been truly a surrender or forfeiture by the defender of his shares to the company solely for the company's benefit, and having been dealt with as such by the company, and not being in violation either of the Companies Acts or the constitution of the company, the defender should be assoilzied. 5. Restitutio in integrum being impossible, the defender should be assoilzied. 7. The company, and the shareholders and creditors thereof, having acquiesced in, adopted, and homologated the said transfer, and the company having re-issued a portion of the shares in question, the pursuers are barred from maintaining their present claims.

A proof was led, in which the defender's averments were established, and from which it further appeared that the suggestion for the transfer of the shares in question was made by the company to Mr Turnbull, the defender's agent,* the articles of association of the company stipulating that "no shareholder shall transfer his shares until he has first made offer of them to the company at the then market price."† The agreement be-

* Mr Turnbull deponed,—"I had communications with the liquidators—I think entirely by letter—in regard to the mode of dealing with those 250 shares. I also communicated with the company as to finding a purchaser for them. They did not succeed in getting a purchaser. They stated that in a similar case the directors had relieved the shareholder on the footing of no price being paid, the shareholder being relieved of all further liability, and they suggested that a similar course should be adopted in Mr Craig's case. I communicated that suggestion to the liquidators, and they approved of it. As the result of that negotiation a transfer of the shares was prepared in favour of the company. I obtained Mr Craig's signature to it, and delivered it to the company. Mr Craig received no consideration of any kind from the company for that transfer. I transmitted it to the secretaries of the company in the usual way. On 19th April they replied that they would lay it before the directors, and I heard no more about it. Mr Craig had no means of paying the £2 per share at the time. It was supposed there was no market for the shares. If the company had proposed to forfeit the shares as against Mr Craig he had no means of preventing them doing so. Mr Craig personally had no interest in the matter at that time. If this transfer had not been made the shares, under the arrangement between me and the liquidators, would have gone over to them. The transfer was in point of fact carried through by me as part of the realisation of Mr Craig's estate under the instructions of the liquidators."

† Mr Alexander Stewart, who had taken charge of the affairs of the Investment Company, deponed,—"Under article 4 of the articles of association a shareholder was bound to make offer of his shares to the company before transferring them, but the company had a right to forfeit these shares, and, having that right, they suggested that Mr Craig should grant a transfer. I believe the directors considered it would be to their advantage that the transfer should be made, because they could re-issue the shares at a profit. I believe their idea was to allot the shares among solvent shareholders. It was arranged at a general meeting of the shareholders to allot those shares among existing shareholders who desired to have them."

tween Mr Craig and the liquidators of the bank, under which the forme obtained his discharge, bore date 27th September and 16th October 187 and Mr Haldane, one of these liquidators, deponed that it was part the arrangement that they should relieve Mr Craig of any liability o the shares transferred to the Investment Company.* The liquidatio had, however, come to an end some years prior to the bringing of th action.

The Lord Ordinary (Kinnear), on 14th June 1890, assoilzied the d fender.†

* "It was part of the bargain that Mr Craig was to be relieved of the shares [certain shares in other companies]; and claims having been made up Mr Craig in respect of them, the liquidators relieved him of them as part of t arrangement under which his estate was transferred. If the General Proper Investment Company had not accepted the transfer of the 250 shares they wou have been in the same position as regards liability as the others."

† "OPINION.— . . . The ground of action is that the transaction up which the transfers were made and accepted was ultra vires of the company, a that the transfers were therefore void ab initio; and this is said to be estab lished by the cases of Trevor v. Whitworth, L. R., 12 App. Ca., and the Pro perty Investment Company v. Matheson, 16 R. 282.

"The distinction between these cases and the present is manifest, and indee is very clearly brought out in the conclusions of the summons. In each of t former cases the company had bought its own shares from one of its membe for a price, and the ground of judgment was that it had no power under t Companies Acts to purchase its own shares, or, in other words, to pay back one of its own members the money or part of the money which he had su scribed to the capital of the company. In the present case, it is set forth the conclusions of the summons that the transfers which it is proposed reduce were executed 'without any price or consideration having been pai and it is established by the minute of admissions that they were given a accepted for the purpose of effecting a surrender of shares by an insolve shareholder who was unable at the time to meet the calls which had been ma upon him.

"Such a case is very clearly distinguished from a case of sale by all t learned Lords who took part in the decision of Trevor v. Whitworth. L Herschell, after explaining as the ground upon which a purchase by the co pany cannot be supported, 'that the statutes require that the whole of the su scribed capital, unless diminished by expenditure upon the objects of the m morandum, shall remain available for the discharge of its liabilities,' goes on say that the view which he had thus expressed is not inconsistent with t forfeiture and surrender of shares,—'The forfeiture of shares is distinc recognised by the Companies Act, and by the articles contained in the schedu which, in the absence of other provisions, regulate the management of a limi liability company. It does not involve any payment by the company, and presumably exonerates from future liability those who have shewn themselv unable to contribute what is due from them to the capital of the compan Surrender no doubt stands on a different footing. But it also does not invol any payment out of the funds of the company. If the surrender were ma in consideration of any such payment it would be neither more nor less than sale, and open to the same objections. If it were accepted in a case where t company were in a position to forfeit the shares, the transaction would seem me perfectly valid.' Lord Watson and Lord Macnaghten made observations the same effect.

"The question is whether the transaction between the company and t defender satisfies the conditions upon which, according to these opinions, surrender may be sustained. It is certain that it did not involve any payme by the company, and therefore the first condition laid down by Lord Hersche

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—The question for the Court was whether the shares in question had been transferred to the company for a valuable consideration. The ground of the Lord Ordinary's judgment was that they had not. But the transaction was not a forfeiture, because there was nothing to shew that the company had proceeded under the forfeiture clauses of Table A of the Companies Act, 1862. The word "surrender" was used in the Companies Clauses Act of 1863 (26 and 27 Vict. c. 118), secs. 9, 10, and 11 (which modified the provisions of section 30 of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act of 1845), but nowhere in the Companies Acts. The right of a shareholder to retire from a company by surrendering his shares must therefore depend upon the regulations of the company in question.[1] Here the only power which affected was completely satisfied. But it seems to me to be equally clear that the second condition also is satisfied, because the surrender was accepted from a shareholder who was quite unable to pay the amount due by him at the time as a contributor to the capital, and whose shares were therefore liable to be forfeited for non-payment. He was the holder of more than £20,000 of the stock of the City of Glasgow Bank, which failed in October 1878, and was liable for calls exceeding £562,000. He appears to have had no other liability of any moment, but his liability to the liquidators of the bank was enough to make him utterly insolvent. In December 1878 a call of £2 per share, or £500, became due to the pursuer's company, and the directors knowing him to be insolvent in consequence of the failure of the bank, agreed to accept a surrender, and to relieve him of his liability for the call.

"It is said that the discharge of his liability to the company was a consideration for the surrender; and therefore that the transaction was in effect a sale. But the same thing must happen in every case of the forfeiture or surrender of the shares of an insolvent shareholder, and also in every case of forfeiture when any part of the capital remains uncalled, even although the call for which the shares are forfeited may be recovered in full. The pursuer, however, maintains that in the present case there was a gratuitous discharge of the shareholder's liability to contribute to the extent of £500, because the liquidators of the bank might have been compelled to pay the call, since they were taking over the whole estate. Mr Haldane's statement makes it probable that the liquidators might have thought it reasonable to pay such a call rather than force a shareholder, who had no other debts, into bankruptcy. But they were not bound to consent to such an arrangement because the defender's estate was altogether insufficient to meet their claims, and a dividend upon the claim of the investment company would have fallen far short of £500. But whatever sum they might have agreed to pay, it cannot be supposed that they would have taken over the shares and so incurred personal liability for the £6 of capital still uncalled. For the evidence is that the shares were not marketable; and the liquidators thought they were not worth enough to cover the calls. If the liquidators had proposed to pay the call in these circumstances, it might have been a fair question for the consideration of the directors whether they should leave shares to which so large a liability would still be attached in the hands of an insolvent shareholder, or whether they should accept a surrender, with the hope of effecting a re-issue to persons who would be able to meet any future calls. This question did not arise for consideration, because no such proposal was made. But the validity of the transaction must depend upon the power of the directors to accept a surrender, and not upon the discretion with which they exercised that power. They had power to accept a surrender, according to the opinions expressed in the House of Lords, because the shareholder was unable to meet his liabilities to the company. He cannot be required to shew that no better arrangement could have been made for the company through the intervention of third persons, who were under no legal obligation to pay the calls in full."

the matter was the provision in the company's articles to the effec that no shareholder could transfer his shares until he had first mad offer of them to the company. Surrender was not authorised by th articles. Where it was authorised by a company's constitution a su render would be good, but, looking to the decision in Trevor v. Whitworth 1887, L. R., 12 App. Ca. 409, if any value were given by the compan it would be bad. The dicta of the learned Lords [1] who decided the case Trevor were to the effect that if a surrender were made in a case in whic the company were in a position to forfeit it would be good, but it would n be so otherwise. The general complexion of the present case shewed tha the transaction in question was looked upon by the parties as a sale. Th fact that there was a transfer was not of importance, for it must alway depend upon the nature of the contract itself whether a transaction was surrender or not. The purchase-money paid in this case by the compan was the remission of the call which was due at the date of the transfe Even in a case of forfeiture under the forfeiture clauses of table A of th Companies Act, 1862, forfeiture would have been attended by the conditio that any calls due at the date of the forfeiture should still be recoverable The case of Klenck [3] shewed that it was just as much a diminution of a capital for a company to grant a discharge of a payment due as for it to purchase its own shares. Further, it was to be kept in view that the surrender had been carried through at the request of the defender, wh wished to be relieved of his shares. The initiative in the transactio had been taken by the defender's agent, and Mr Haldane admitted tha the bank would have been obliged to relieve the defender of any liabiliti in connection with the shares if the company had not taken them ove It could not therefore be said that there was not a dealing with the share here just as in the case of Matheson.[4] The surrender, accordingly, w invalid, because it had not the same consequences as a forfeiture. Alte natively, it was bad altogether, because there was no power in the Act of Parliament or in the articles of the association sanctioning such a tran action. There was a third view which might be supported, for the com pany might have lain by, and after the composition arrangement wit the bank had been carried through they might have had recourse up the defender for the calls.[5]

Argued for the respondent;—The question to be decided was whethe he was still a shareholder, or whether he had not ceased to be so in 187 The distinction between the present case and those of Matheson and Tre in which it had been held that a company could not buy its own share was apparent from the terms of the transfer. There was here no con sideration given by the company. Surrender occupied an intermedia position between sale and forfeiture. A surrender of shares woul admittedly be bad if it approached the category of a sale, or went diminish the capital of the company.[6] The Companies Acts were silen

as to surrenders. In the present case the facts were similar to those in the case of Hall,[1] with this essential distinction,—that the debtor in Hall's case was solvent,—here Mr Craig was at the date of the surrender hopelessly insolvent. The case was therefore in a different category as regarded the legal result. The reclaimer founded upon the negotiations and actings between the bank and Mr Craig, but the directors of the company had nothing to do with the bank, and knew nothing of any arrangement with it. The true view was that although the formalities of forfeiture had not been observed, nevertheless there was a real forfeiture of the shares, for Mr Craig had done all he could to sever his connection with the company.[2] The company had not given any consideration for the transfer, and had paid nothing towards the outstanding call. There was merely a discharge of future liabilities as the transfer bore. It must be assumed that the company had considered the matter, and had found that the defender was hopelessly insolvent, and it was not necessary that a debtor who was willing to surrender should be made bankrupt for past calls. Further, a company and its liquidator had the same power of compromising claims as an individual had, and the surrender must on that ground be upheld[3] as part of the compromise made with the bank. Besides, owing to the lapse of time and the discharge of the liquidators of the bank, no redress could now be obtained from them, although they admitted in evidence through Mr Haldane, one of their number, that they would have been bound to relieve the defender of any liability in connection with the shares in question. The surrender had remained unimpeached for many years, and there was a clear presumption of knowledge and acquiescence on the part of the company, preventing its now being opened up.[4]

At advising,—

LORD M'LAREN.—The question in this case is, whether the transfer of Mr Craig's shares to the company is void, as falling under the general rule that a company constituted under the Companies Acts is not entitled to purchase its own shares. There can be no doubt as to the justice of the rule or as to its obligatory character. It is a condition of the constitution of every limited company that there shall be individual liability to the extent defined by its memorandum and articles of association, and it is evident that the purchase of its own shares by such a company is equivalent to a reduction of its uncalled capital, or, in other words, is an extinction of individual liability to the extent of the value of the shares purchased by the company. This is the ground of the judgments of the House of Lords in Trevor v. Whitworth, and of this Court in the case of The Property Investment Company v. Matheson.

An exception to this rule of company law is indicated in the opinions of the Lords of Appeal who advised the case of Trevor v. Whitworth, and particularly in the passage quoted by the Lord Ordinary from the judgment of Lord Herschell. The exception is that, where the company is in a position to forfeit the shares, a surrender of the shares to the company may be valid. By a surrender I understand a transfer of the shares to the company without consideration.

The statutes do not prescribe any special form of surrender, probably because was not thought desirable to give facilities for the release of a shareholder fro his obligations to the creditors of the company, and it may be assumed that surrender must take the form of a transfer by the shareholder to the company

Now, in seeking to apply that principle of the exception indicated by L Herschell and the other Judges of the House of Lords to an actual case, it m be observed that their Lordships had not a case of this kind before them. Th were only pointing out that there was or might be a limit to the application the general rule against the acquisition by a company of its own shares. T present case is said to be an exceptional case, and it is therefore necessary define the exception, or at least to consider its application to the circumstan of the present case.

Under the Companies Acts the shares of a member may be forfeited beca of his inability or refusal to pay calls which are due, and in such a case t right of the company is reserved to recover the unpaid calls, notwithstandi the forfeiture of the shares.
